Mr. Harold Boyd
President
Virginia State AFL-CIO
102 N. Belvedere Street
Richmond, Virginia

Dear Hal:

As I told you when we saw each other so briefly in Richmond, I have returned to the Southern Regional Council to head its labor program. I will be on leave of absence from my post at the University of Wisconsin.

Our plans are to provide a fairly wide range of educational programs and other services of interest to state and local councils, regional offices and local unions, as well as to individual union leaders. The primary emphasis will be on understanding current southern problems, racial relations and civil rights. I certainly look forward to an opportunity to renew both friendships and working relations with you and the Virginia labor movement.

Incidentally, I plan to be in Hot Springs during the time of the advanced Southern Labor School to sit in on the meetings of the Southern Advisory Committee to the AFL-CIO Rights Department. I hope to spend a few days there. Perhaps I should ask you, as President of the School, if it is convenient for me to attend the first few days of sessions.

It will be good to see you again. My regards to the other Virginia officers.

Sincerely,

Emory F. Via
Director, Labor Program

Dear Emory,

George tells me that you are going to teach a class on "how to improve union meetings" at the Virginia Legislative Conference on April 16th.

Hal Boyd will show the film "Heart of the Union" to the entire group the first thing in the morning before they break up into smaller groups. This will save time in your discussion group. I am shipping 200 copies of the enclosed material on improving union meetings to the conference. They will be available if you care to use them in your class.

Looking forward to seeing you in Norfolk.

Dear Emory:

Please accept my apology for the delay in answering your letter of March 9. At the time I received it, I was in the midst of preparations for our convention which just ended and I was not able to keep up with my correspondence.

The voter registration problem we have had in Louisiana, insofar as the Justice Department is concerned, is that we have been unable to get the Department of Justice to make an all-out drive to register Negroes in Louisiana. I am sure they have problems connected with this; however, it seems to me that after these people have been deprived of the opportunity to vote for so many years, every effort should be made to give them that opportunity. We have sponsored efforts jointly with the Negro community throughout Louisiana to step up the registration program but this is a very costly and time-consuming project, as you well know. The Department of Justice can do it much more rapidly and efficiently than we can. To date we have not been very successful in getting Mr. Katzenbach to move as fast as we would like.

Trusting this is the information you need and with best wishes, I am

I have just received the preliminary announcement of the Gulf Coast Labor School. Recently I attended the Tri-State School in North Carolina. It was an excellent undertaking and had enthusiastic participation from the union members attending.

I wonder if the Gulf Coast School doesn't offer a good opportunity to spread the idea of labor education more broadly to your members in Georgia. It seems to me that it would be a good preliminary for your spreading interest in labor education in the state.

I have not heard from Georgia State College as to when it would be convenient for them to meet with me. I'll let you know as soon as anything develops.

If you would be interested in some such program I will be happy to talk with you about it or to write a more detailed suggestion of what we might do in Virginia.

Such programs can be offered either on a state-wide or regional basis, through a local body, or through a group of locals in the same national union. The information I would most need in order to send you a more detailed proposal would be how long you think such an institute should run, what group(s) you hope to reach, and at what level.

Dear Barney:

It was very good indeed to see you at Daytona Beach and to bet a chance to talk with you on the return trip. I am enclosing a proposal for possible educational institutes to be held in Alabama. You will note that several kinds of institutes are suggested. And it is possible to pick from a very large number of topics when putting together an institute program.

I know that this is a special time for you and that you may prefer to delay the consideration of such a proposal until after the fall election. However, I wanted to follow up my offer to be of assistance to you and the state body in any way that's practical.

If you think that any of the ideas in the enclosed proposal or a program of even more basic union education would be more useful prior to the election please don't hesitate to be in touch with me. In any event, it may be that you would like to do some planning with me and others of your selection as to the kinds of programs that would be useful after November.

As you will understand from the proposal I stand ready to be of assistance not only in terms of instruction but also in planning and to some degree of promotion and administration.

Best personal wishes.

I have just returned to the office and found your letter of August 12, regarding Ray Jenkins' expenses. We are today mailing him a check for $151.16 to cover the past two institutes.

I surely am sorry George did not work out the details of the Southern Labor School in time for you to participate in that. It was the best we've ever had, with 86 students present. We surely would have liked to have had you there. I know you would have had to work hard, but I believe you would have enjoyed it, too, since we had such a sharp group.

We will be staying at the Battle House Hotel in Mobile, and will make your reservations there if this is agreeable.

Best wishes and warmest regards.

Dear Barney:

This letter is to follow-up on our conversation about getting letters of support from local unions for the proposed NILE program for Disadvantaged Unionist in the South. All letters should be sent to:

Joe Mire
National Institute of Labor Education
American University
1911 "F" Street, N.W.
Washington, D. C. 20006

You will recall that the proposal is to provide education services, classes ~~in~~ of Institutes, to the members and leaders of unions which have substantial minority or poverty level memberships.

I know that several national unions have already written letters of support. These include the Retail Clerks, IUE, Laborers, AFSCME and TWUA. Aside from these the Civil Rights Department has expressed support with a promise of cooperation. You may wish to recall that NILE has been receiving a substantial annual contribution from the AFL-CIO.

The letters can be quite simple emphasizing the need for leadership and membership training either for effective training to improve the quality of participation in the union and/or to improve the character of the union's participation in community affairs.

Although these expressions of interest and cooperation will be quite useful to NILE they, of course, do not represent a binding agreement to work with them.

I know this is an especially busy time for you, but if three or four letters from locals could be sent to Joe Mire, he would be most appreciative.

Fraternally and sincerely,

Emory F. Via

Dear Barney:

Thanks for your letter and the list of delegates to the Gulf Coast Institute.

I appreciate your invitation to participate in your convention. I plan to be there. It would suit my schedule fine to be on the program Tuesday morning. I plan to come into Mobile in the afternoon or evening of Monday October 10.

Will you let me know, if you want me to stay at the Battle House Hotel, or if you would prefer for me to make my own reservations. I will be prepared for about a thirty-minute presentation centering on the Role of Labor Education in the Contemporary South. However, I can quite flexible as to time and either expand or contract my remarks as your schedule requires.

As always it was good to see and work with you in Mobile last weekend.

Best personal wishes.

Dear Barney:

Sometime ago I discussed with you the possibility of getting two or three letters from locals in Alabama expressing interest in the proposal for disadvantaged unionists sponsored by the National Institute of Labor Education (NILE).

I understand that O.E.O. is still actively considering this proposal, but that it very much wants some showing of interest from local unions in the South. These letters do not have to be in the form of commitments, just expressions of interest.

A foundation has already put in enough money to provide the matching funds. If O.E.O. comes through, it would provide a sizable amount of money for educational work with unions which have either large numbers of members who fall close to the poverty line or a heavy concentration of minority members.

There is need for speed at this time. If you can do something about this it would be a real service. I am enclosing some sample letters in case they may be of assistance.

The national level endorsements that I have heard of include: T.W.U.A., A.F.S.C.M.E., Laborers, I.U.E., Retail Clerks, and the D. C. Labor Council. Joe Mire tells me that the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Department also supports it. You recall that NILE gets a substantial grant from the AFL-CIO.

Best personal wishes.

Dear Matt:

Please bear with me for a longish letter and a number of requests. Its for a good end. This information will be used as part of a briefing session for a select group of state legislators from three states. Anything which should be kept confidential as to source, please so indicate.

Unfortunately, I need the information as soon as possible.

I am interested in information which the state body may have developed on unemployment compensation, workmen's compensation, and state minimum wage-maximum hour laws.

It would be most helpful to have: (a) your criticism of existing legislation, (b) proposals for changes, (c) analysis of the state's (or employers') ability to pay for improvements, (d) difficulties in administration, (e) drafts of new bills (and who supports), (f) digests or popular interpretations of existing legislation.'

If you have done a vote analysis in the state legislature regarding the above laws, this would be useful.

A private assessment of the "good" and "bad" guys administering the legislation would be most helpful--say, for example, where a serious legislator could go or should not go for insight and assistance. Similarly, who in your organization would be the appropriate person for such a legislator to contact for expert assistance?

If you have worked on wage collection or protection legislation, any of the above kinds of information regarding it would be welcome.

Dear Emory:

I apologize for the delay in answering your letter. I have been out of town and have been forced to neglect my mail to some extent.

The Texas AFL-CIO has not published any material on unemployment or workmen's compensation. We have no minimum wage law in Texas but we stand a chance of getting one enacted by the next session of the state legislature after the publicity generated by the striking Rio Grande City farm workers and their 400 mile march to Austin.

In regard to workmen's compensation, I am enclosing the Department of Labor's "State Workmen's Compensation Laws: A Comparison of Major Provisions with Recommended Standards," and the AFL-CIO worksheet on both Workmen's Compensation and Unemployment Compensation. I would also recommend the Chamber of Commerce publication "Analysis of Workmen's Compensation Laws" and the Labor Department's latest "Brief Summary of State Workmen's Compensation Laws" which has been updated with a supplemental data sheet to November of 1966. We have only one copy of these, so we cannot send them along, but you can see that the Texas laws are unsatisfactory. The workmen's compensation law meets the minimum standards in only three areas out of sixteen: agency authority to supervise and control medical care, a rehabilitation division, and administration by a state agency.

Our proposed bill is enclosed which provides, among other things, for increased benefits to two-thirds of the average weekly wage, death benefits to widows until death or remarriage, to children until they are eighteen, and benefits for total or permanent disability payable for life or for the period of the disability.

The unemployment compensation benefits should also be increased to realistically reflect the higher cost of living, and the requirements for eligibility should not be unduly restrictive. About fifty per cent of the work force of the state is not covered by the act and we feel coverage should be extended to all.

As far as the private assessment of "good guys" in our Bureau of Labor Statistics, there are none! We have a few friends that legislators can go to in the Texas Employment Commission as labor relations representatives and they are Bill Stockton in Houston, W. L. Allgood in Fort Worth, Frank Swales in Beaumont and Terry Sheffield in San Antonio. In our own office, our expert is Roy Evans, the Secretary-Treasurer.

I hope I have been of some help, and apologize again for the delay. Hoping that you and your family have had a happy holiday season, I remain

Sincerely,

Hank

Alabama Unions Plan Low-Cost Housing Units

Tuscaloosa—The Alabama AFL-CIO has received federal approval for the drawing of initial plans to build low-income-family housing in Birmingham, Florence and Decatur, council officers reported at the eighth biennial convention of the state central body.

That means the start of preliminary work on 800 housing units to be built with federal loans costing $11 million, Pres. Barney Weeks advised 550 delegates from the state's affiliated unions. Eventually the state council hopes to sponsor low-cost housing in every Alabama city where union members are concentrated, Weeks said.

The convention gave Weeks and Sec.-Treas. A. G. Trammell new two-year terms, and authorized the executive board to proceed with its housing program.

Weeks reported a membership gain of 15,000 since the 1968 convention and noted the success of a state-wide prescription drug program launched by the state body. Since its start 18 months ago, more than 32 stores have signed contracts to furnish members of affiliated unions with needed medicines at actual cost plus what Weeks called "a small professional fee."

Members of AFL-CIO unions are saving more than $500,000 a year on drugs because of the program, Weeks estimated.

Among convention speakers were Gov. Albert P. Brewer (D), whose term in office expires Jan. 15; Chief Justice-elect Howell Heflin of the Alabama Supreme Court; Bill Baxley of Dothan, attorney general-elect; Jerry Beasley, lieutenant-governor-elect; Stanton Smith, AFL-CIO central bodies' coordinator, and Irma Angevine, executive director of the Consumers Federation of America.

The incoming state officials assured the delegates that labor and the consumer will get fair treatment when they assume office next January.

The convention called on the state attorney general to set up a consumer protection department, and Baxley promised the delegates he would do just that early in his new term of office.

Heflin pledged that labor will get a fair hearing in the state's top court, and Beasley announced that legislation of interest to labor will be referred to fair committees in the next session of the legislature.

The convention adopted a policy statement calling for a state minimum wage of $1.60 an hour. On the federal level, it voted to back the AFL-CIO drive for national health insurance and an occupational health and safety law.

Georgia Labor Asks Improved Minimum Pay

Augusta, Ga. — The Georgia State AFL-CIO laid the groundwork at its 14th annual convention for an all-out drive to boost the state minimum wage to $1.50 an hour.

The 650 delegates also called on the state legislature to extend coverage of the wage law to more workers. Through labor's efforts, the legislature earlier this year adopted the state's first minimum wage law setting a floor of $1.25 an hour for covered workers.

Delegates voted to increase monthly per capita payments from 10 cents to 12 cents. The additional income will be channelled mainly into COPE operations and legislative programs of the state body.

Pres. J. O. Moore told the convention that 8,000 new members were enrolled in the state body since the last convention to boost the total membership to 74,000 members.

Moore was re-elected to his second two-year term as president, defeating former Sec. J. W. Giles. In the contest for secretary, H. H. Marbry of the Carpenters was elected over Melvin Tate of the Pulp-Sulphite Workers. Mrs. Louise Dean was re-elected treasurer.

Speakers at the three-day convention included Assistant Sec. of Labor W. J. Usery and Georgia Commissioner of Labor Sam Caldwell.

Times, News Reach Pacts With Guild

New York—Wage increases as high as $100 a week are provided in new three-year contracts tentatively agreed upon by the Newspaper Guild and the New York Times and the Daily News.

Guild negotiators reached agreement a few hours before a scheduled walkout and sent the terms to a vote Nov. 9 by 2,600 Guildsmen at the Times and about 1,400 at the News.

No details were released pending unit votes, but a Guild spokesman said the papers offered the same 41.69 percent package increase won by the Guild at the Post, and by other unions from the publishers.

Under the pattern formula, top minimum wages for experienced reporters, copy editors and advertising salesmen will rise at the Times from $255.25 to $361.66 a week in the third year and at the News from $242.55 to $343.67.

Guild members have been working under a contract extension since Mar. 30. Besides wages, which will go up in yearly increments of 15, 11 and 11 percent, issues at the two dailies include a full union shop, percentage increases applied to top minimums in all Guild classifications, conversion of a six-minute reduction in working time per day to cash or other benefits, and improved pensions.

Theodore W. Kheel, chief mediator in the talks that started last February, said contract approval by members of the Guild and the photoengravers would close out the 1970 round of negotiations. Kheel was aided by federal and state mediators.

Eugene Goslee Named Labor Board Solicitor

The appointment of Eugene G. Goslee as solicitor of the National Labor Relations Board was announced by NLRB Chairman Edward B. Miller. Goslee, 48, is a veteran NLRB attorney.

Goslee succeeds William Feldesman, now on leave for an assignment on behalf of the International Labor Organization in Africa. On his return, Feldesman will become a special assistant to Board Member John H. Fanning.

Dear Emory:

Since talking with you by telephone, I have checked with the presidents of the central bodies in Childersburg, the Tri-Cities and in Mobile. The president of the Tri-Cities Central Body gave us a tentative okay but said he would officially clear it with his central body on the 21st of this month and let us know immediately. The President of the Mobile Central Body also gave us a tentative okay, but will officially clear it with his central body on the 20th of this month. The president of the central body in Childersburg felt that he could give us a positive okay without waiting for his central body.

I will, of course, let you know immediately after the central body meetings in Mobile and the Tri-Cities, but I am positive in my own mind that we will get an okay. It is my opinion that we should start getting the call out as fast as possible after these two dates, at least for the first meeting in Sheffield.

You will hear from me as soon as possible.

Best wishes and warmest regards.

Dear Barney:

It occurred to me a little late that you might want to go ahead and announce the school in Childersburg on August 5th and 6th. We would still plan to have the film and comment on labor history for the opening session. And Saturday morning we would have Jenkins talking on the impact of reapportionment on Alabama politics. For that conference, however, the other main topic would be local union administration.

Would you please send me copies of any announcements that you are mailing out in regard to these programs. This will be a further help in keeping us coordinated especially in regards to time, places, and the way we are phrasing the subject matter.

Best personal wishes.

Dear Emory:

After a lot of maneuvering around I managed to get Rudy Oswald of our Department of Research to attend the Central Body Conference in Alabama on July 29 and 30. Rudy is an excellent person who has done a good deal of work on the Minimum Wage and can handle the whole poverty problem realistically.

I had planned to check with you on this but Barney told me that you were on vacation. He knows Rudy very well and was glad to get him. If you want to talk to Rudy about the program, call him here at the AFL-CIO in the Research Department.

In order that I might tie down reservations for our accommodations at the Holiday Inn in Florence for the first institute, would you please advise me who we'll have that I should make reservations for other than for you, Ray Jenkins and my group.

Dear Mr. Jenkins:

This letter will give you a few more details regarding the conference with the Alabama AFL-CIO on the week end of July 20-30. The sessions will be held in Sheffield at the Ironworkers' Hall, 506 Nashville Avenue. However, I have made reservations for you at the Holiday Inn in Florence where the rest of the teaching staff will be housed.

The sessions will begin on Friday evening at 7:00 p.m. with a labor history film and discussion.

The next morning we will begin promptly at 9:00 and have your session, "The Impact of Reapportionment on State Politics." This session will run until 12 but we will take a break about midway. We had discussed earlier your taking about thirty minutes to lay out some of the groundwork and then to get into a discussion with the group. Your experience is such that I feel sure we will have no difficulty keeping the discussion going for the period of time alloted. Although you may feel that a half hour is not enough time to say all that you would like to say in your initial presentation, you will find that as the discussion goes on there will be adequate opportunities to reinforce any points you feel need to be made. By and large you will find the group one interested in increasing its political understanding. It may be that there are some tough problems which they are somewhat reluctant to face up to, but my general experience is that they are quite responsive to factual interpretive material.

In the afternoon we will be discussing the union's role in the poverty program. You are most welcome to stay.

I hope to have in hand maps showing the reapportioned districts for both the House and the Senate as well as Congressional district maps to distribute to each person.

I look forward to seeingyyou on the 29th. Please be in touch with me, by collect call, if you have any questions whatsoever.

Sincerely,

Emory F. Via, Director

Dear Rudy:

George Guernsey tells me that you will be with us for the Alabama Education Conference to be held in Florence on July 29 and 30. Good. I had tried to reach you by phone to discuss the program but your office said you would not be back in until August 1st.

On Friday evening we will show THE INHERITANCE and have a discussion. Saturday morning will be devoted to "The Impact of Reapportionment on Alabama Politics." This will be led by Ray Jenkins with the Montgomery Advertiser.

For the afternoon, the general topic will be "The Unions' Role in the Poverty Program." This will be the portion of the program for which you will have the chief responsibility. You will have roughly three hours at your disposal with time out in the middle for a break.

I envision the session accomplishing several things. One is to provide some orientation to poverty problems and a presentation of those programs designed to affect them. Two, we should explore especially the problems affecting the Appalachian region and specific proposals for meeting them. And, three, we should spend a fair amount of time discussing the how and why of union involvement in poverty programs. I don't know what kinds of materials you like to use with such a group, but you may wish to check with George regarding what the Education Department has available. Anything which you wish to distribute should be brought in quantities of about fifty or more each.

We will be providing copies of the American Federationist for April, 1966; "Labor's Role in the War on Poverty," an AFL-CIO Guide; and a summary of the Appalachian Regional Development Act published by the AFL-CIO Appalachian Council.

I am asking Al Ulmer of our staff also to be on hand for the Saturday afternoon session. You should feel no special responsibility to use him, although I find him a good resource on the practical problems of poverty programs in operation and in terms of the difficulties and hopes of working with disadvantaged folk. You should know, too, that the AFL-CIO coordinator for the poverty programs in Alabama will be on hand as will Oscar Wisdom who is president of the Tri-Cities Labor Council and a participant in the Appalachian Council training project operating out of the University of West Virginia. You should feel free to draw on the experience of any of these people as it fits in with what you would like to do.

Would you call me when you get into your office in case you would like to discuss anything involving this program. I have had a reservation made for you at the Holiday Inn in Florence, Alabama for Friday, July 29. Of course, I do not know if you plan to be in on Friday evening or on Saturday morning. Could you let me know about this also?

Sincerely,

Emory F. Via, Director

AFL-CIO Appalachian Council

About the Council

The AFL-CIO Appalachian Council is an Amalgamation or joining together of all AFL-CIO organizations in the eleven-state Appalachian Area.

The formation of this unique regional organization is a direct result of the "Appalachian Trade Union Conference" held in Charleston, West Virginia October 12-14, 1964. Present in the conference were representatives of AFL-CIO unions from every state in the eleven-state region. At its concluding session the conference unanimously adopted a resolution urging and approving the establishment of a permanent Appalachian Organization. Specifically the resolution stated that such an organization should work toward "unearthing and understanding problems of the region, developing plans for their solution, and stimulating or undertaking specific projects or action programs for their elimination."

Subsequent to the conference, permission was obtained from the National AFL-CIO to form the organization and, in December 1964, an organizational meeting was held in Washington at which time the officers whose names appear on the opposite page were selected.

Since the conference was held in October, both the Economic Opportunities Act and the Appalachian Regional Development Act have been passed by Congress. The Council can now be of invaluable assistance in making these programs successful in the Appalachian Region.

About This Pamphlet

This pamphlet is designed to give a quick summary of the provisions of the Appalachian Regional Development Act. Many questions have been raised relative to the allocations of funds among the states to finance the various programs provided in the Act. Unfortunately, at the time of this printing, such information was not available. When it is released the Council will see that proper distribution is given this important information.

A Summary of the Appalachian Regional Development Act (1965)

The Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965 (P.L. 89-4), signed by President Johnson on March 9, authorizes a variety of programs designed to stimulate the economic development of the Appalachian Region. This region of 167,000 square miles sweeps diagonally across 11 states from northern Pennsylvania to central Alabama and has a population of more than 16 million.

Appalachia contains 360 contiguous counties in portions of Pennsylvania, Maryland, Ohio, Virginia,

APPALACHIA

Kentucky, Tennessee, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and all of West Virginia. One-third of the population of Appalachia, compared to one-fifth nationally, is beset by poverty, according to the standards established by the President's Council of Economic Advisors.

This Act is the direct result of the concerted efforts of the Conference of Appalachian Governors and the President's Appalachian Regional Commission established in 1963; it is composed of representatives of the Appalachian States and a dozen Federal agencies.

In making its legislative recommendations, the President's Commission noted that Appalachia was plagued by low income, high unemployment, lack of urbanization, low educational achievement, and relatively low living standards and that "a coordinated, adequately funded and sustained effort must be undertaken to restore the region's economic vitality." Accordingly, the Commission recommended a variety of programs designed to revitalize the Appalachian economy on four fronts:

1. Better access to and within the region;
2. Fuller development of the land and timber resources of Appalachia;
3. Improved management of Appalachia's valuable water resources, and
4. Improvements in human resources and public facilities.

In addition to providing for public investments in the Appalachian Region, the Act establishes a framework for joint Federal and State efforts to attack the region's common problems on a coordinated regional basis. The Appalachian Regional Commission will administer the Appalachian program in such a way as to promote economic growth in the Region and enable it to develop a more diversified industry.

The Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965 does not contain all of the programs for which monies will be made available during fiscal year 1966. It contains only those programs requiring new legislative authorizations or modification to existing legislative authorizations.

Funds to carry out the entire program, both those provisions contained in P.L. 89-4 and those programs already authorized which require additional funds for increased activities in the Appalachian Region are provided for in a special appropriations bill recently submitted to Congress.

The main provisions of the Appalachian Regional Development Act are as follows:

Highways

An Appalachian Development Highway System will be constructed to provide access to isolated sections of the region and to make possible a greater flow of industry and tourism between areas within the region and between the region and the rest of the country. Existing roads will be upgraded and new sections constructed to open up areas with a developmental potential. A total of 3,350 miles of roads shall be built of which 1,000 miles are reserved for local access roads, to serve specific developmental facilities, including recreational, residential, commercial, industrial or like facilities.

Water Resources

A comprehensive water resources study is authorized for the entire Appalachian Region. The study will be coordinated by the Secretary of the Army, assisted by all relevant agencies. Acceleration of water facilities construction in the region is requested in the supplemental appropriation bill for Appalachia. There will be a heavy emphasis on flood control, industrial and recreational impoundments and sewage treatment plants.

Timber

The timber program includes accelerated research into end uses for the Appalachian hardwoods found throughout the region; increased national Forest Land acquisition; more access roads in National Forests to increase the cut from matured timber; assistance to local nonprofit corporations, known as timber development organizations, designed to manage and produce better grades of timber, thereby earning a greater return for the small landowner.

Land Conservation

To promote the conservation and better utilization of the region's important land and water resources, the Act authorizes a program of grants to landowners for the adoption and improvement of land treatment practices. The Department of Agriculture will administer grants for land treatment to prevent erosion and to promote soil conservation.

A special coal lands program gives the Secretary of the Interior broadened authority to seal and fill voids in abandoned coal mines, extinguish mine fires and expand the restoration of fish and wildlife sites destroyed by strip mining. The Secretary of the Interior is also directed to carry out a comprehensive strip mining study which should give the answers needed for the development of a broader strip mining program. The authorizations in the bill, together with the program to be included in the supplemental appropriations bill, will make it possible to begin a comprehensive regional program of coal lands reclamation that will enhance the region's attractiveness to industry and to tourism.

Human Resources and Public Facilities

The Act provides a specific program for the construction and operation of multi-county health centers which will contribute to the economic development of the region. A special supplement to the Vocational Educational Act of 1963 is also provided which makes $16 million available over a two-year period for the construction of vocational education facilities. In addition, the Act provides a supplemental fund to be used to reduce the local cost of participation in Federal grant-in-aid programs for the construction of public facilities.

Among the programs to be supplemented in this fashion are those providing funds for hospitals, vocational education facilities, higher education facilities, including community colleges and technical schools, libraries, educational television facilities, airports, sewage treatment plants and public recreation facilities.

There will be careful coordination of the construction activities with the Office of Economic Opportunity, directed by Mr. Sargent Shriver. The Office of Economic Opportunity will provide operating funds for activities to be carried out in many of the facilities that will be constructed with Appalachian program funds.

Coordination and Execution

An Appalachian Regional Commission is created by the Act to coordinate this new program as well as to make recommendations with regard to existing programs and to provide program planning. This Commission will be comprised of representatives from each of the eleven Appalahican States and a Federal co-chairman appointed by the President whose vote would equal the states' vote. Project applications for grants and technical assistance will be made through the state members of the Commission, who shall evaluate such applications. Only those applications for programs and projects which are approved by a state member will receive Commission approval.

The Act requires that the Commission make its investment in areas which have a potential for growth and where the return on public dollars invested will be maximized. All investments must be in accordance with overall program plans recommended by the Commission and approved by an officer designated by the President.

To enable local areas to develop projects and plans which will lead to their economic development, grant funds are provided in the Act to cover part of the administrative expenses of local development districts.

Conclusion

The labor movement has a great stake in developing the human and natural resources of Appalachia. The Council is currently planning programs and projects to assist AFL-CIO organizations to be more effective in this endeavor.

If your organization would like more specific information regarding the Applachian Regional Development Act, the Economic Opportunity Act or the activity of the Council, please contact your state central body or write directly to the:

AN EDITORIAL

The No. 1 Domestic Problem

Despite all the talk about inflation by economists and newspaper writers, the No. 1 domestic problem in America today is poverty.

It is not surprising that we in the labor movement see this fact more clearly than anyone except the poor themselves. Poverty was our original enemy from the day the first trade union was established; it will remain the enemy until it is exterminated from American life.

Poverty is a curse in any era. Its persistence in a period of unparalleled opulence is an intolerable affront to the national conscience, a denial of the American promise so proudly proclaimed for two centuries.

The time to end poverty is now—in the decade of the Sixties. The means are available; they need only to be used.

The first essential is jobs at good wages for all. More than half the poverty in the nation is the direct result of unemployment, low wages and involuntary part-time work.

Unemployment has been declining at a gratifying rate. But real or potential shortages of workers with certain skills should not be allowed to obscure the backwaters of the manpower pool that remain largely unreached.

The place to start is with a higher minimum wage, applicable to all workers in interstate commerce. The wage-hour bill now before Congress proposes a long step in that direction—but only one step out of many that must be taken.

A corresponding need is more and better education at all levels—not only equal and unlimited opportunity for the young, but catch-up schooling, training and retraining for adults. Impressive progress has been made in recent years, but the immense backlog that remains is obvious to the least sensitive observer.

The ultimate answer to the hypocritical lament that a higher minimum wage takes work away from the unskilled is the full development of every worker's potential ability. Yet better education and a realistic wage floor, even in combination, cannot assure the elimination of poverty.

There also must be a concerted, well-planned federal policy to ensure full employment in times of peace as well as times of war. The massive investment in America, which we in the AFL-CIO have advocated for years, must be carried on. While the demands imposed by the Viet Nam war of course have top priority, there must be no retreat in the continuing struggle for a better life for all.

If poverty is to be wiped out, another group requires special attention. One-fifth of the poor is old—too old to get get jobs, past what is normally accepted as the retirement age. They have been helped by the modest increase in social security pensions; they will be helped soon by medicare, but they deserve further measures to cope with their problems and extend their useful lives.

I write these words in the full knowledge that President Johnson, more than two years ago, declared a war on poverty. I write in the full knowledge that there has since developed, on a vastly expanded scale, a different kind of war in Viet Nam. We in the AFL-CIO fully support both these wars.

But we do not accept the proposition that America must choose between these two wars, fighting either one or the other. We believe that both must be fought—and won.

The United States is not faced with a choice between guns or butter. The extermination of poverty is not "butter"—it is muscle, muscle to make this free land stronger, in spirit and substance, in the struggle against communism and every other form of tyranny.

When we fight to end poverty in America, we are fighting for the cause of human liberty throughout the world—for the aspirations of all mankind.

The World

A family of four is eating its big meal of the day together. They live in a large city and the father works full time. Assuming the wife is a shrewd shopper and a good cook, she can spend a total of 95 cents for this feast.

The official government statistics would describe these four Americans as the very best-off of the poor, for poverty is now defined as an income which will not allow an urban family of four to spend $4.60 a week per person on food. That's 22 cents per person per meal—or 95 cents for everyone on a big occasion.

It is, of course, true that the people who have less than this minimal budget are not inevitably starving. Living in the most prosperous nation in the history of mankind, they simply have to choose among necessities. And depending on exactly how you compute the human misery in America, there are between 34 and 50 million citizens living at levels which will not let them spend 95 cents for a four-person meal.

It is particularly important to emphasize the dimensions of poverty today since there is now a very real danger of over-optimism about our progress. Unemployment has been reduced to around 4 percent for the first time in years; and in its 1966 report, the Council of Economic Advisers announced that, in 1963 and 1964, almost 3 million people were liberated from poverty. So there will be those who will conclude that we are not so far from the goal proclaimed in the preamble to the Economic Opportunity Act: "It is the policy of the United States to eliminate the paradox of poverty in the midst of plenty. . . ."

Perhaps the best way to begin to understand how profound the poverty is, even with the progress that has been made, is to realize that the "poverty line" is just a figure of speech.

The government has figured out that it would take an annual income of $3,130 to provide that four-person family with its miserable 95-cent meal. This is the upper limit of poverty as we now define it and it is a very useful and important thing to have developed such a criterion.

Yet, are people freed from the want and insecurity of being poor the moment they have $3,130 a year—or even when they get all the way up to $4,000? It is crucial in this context that we understand poverty as a dynamic world and not as a mathematical "line." Mollie Orshansky of the Social Security Administration was one of the researchers who came up with the data and analysis for the government definitions. And she brilliantly realized this larger notion of poverty when she spoke of people "who live within the bleak circle of poverty or at least hover around its edge."

For the family with $3,130 or even $4,000 a year is only one illness, one accident, one recession away from not being able to buy that 95-cent holiday meal. They "hover" around poverty, they are in its magnetic field. And, Orshansky concluded, if one takes this broader notion of what it means to be poor, then we are talking about 50 million Americans, 22 million of them children.

And this last statistic about 22 million young people emphasizes another crucial aspect of the dimensions of poverty: that it is, to an incredible extent, a youthful phenomenon; that there is, therefore, a very real growth potential for impoverishment in the United States.

war in January 1964, he used a fairly rough definition of what poverty was: $3,000 a year for a family. Since then, governmental and private scholars have made our definitions much more precise, adjusting the income figure for family size, urban and rural, etc.

The most shocking thing to emerge from this calibration of economic suffering in the United States is that the young are "poorer" than the rest of the society. So it was that in 1965, the Council of Economic Advisers announced there were 15 million Americans under 18 years of age living beneath the poverty line—five million more than we originally thought. This count was made on the basis of a strict, statistical notion of what it means to be poor. But when Orshansky's insight into the millions who "hover" about poverty is brought into play, then there are, as noted earlier, 22 million poor children in this country.

In other words, almost half of the total poverty population—43 percent to be exact—is under 18. Or, put another way, one out of every five Americans is poor—but one out of every four young Americans is in this plight.

This is particularly tragic today because we are more and more learning that poverty could become hereditary for the first time in our history. In the old days of the great, impoverished immigrant waves, millions who had less than a grade school education, or who couldn't even speak English, were absorbed by an economy which had a tremendous need for simple muscle power. And so it was a typical American experience that the children of a poor man would not be poor. Today, however, there is a new, sophisticated economy with machines which possess the skill of a high school graduate, at least.

In the age of automation, it is three or four or five times as hard to "lift one's self by the bootstraps," as in immigrant times, because one has to get three or four or five times higher than ever before in order to find a decent job. This means that, unless we move radically, those 15 to 22 million impoverished young Americans of today are going to be the fathers and mothers of an even larger poverty generation of tomorrow.

Right now, for instance, the 1966 manpower report of the U.S. Department of Labor anticipates there will be more drop-outs in the 25-29 age group in 1975 than there are today (3.3 million in 1965; almost 5 million in 1975). What are these young people going to do; how will they fit into the most technological society ever known? In the last several years, we have been more successful in finding work for hordes of untrained young people. But there have been very special circumstances: some $20 billion in tax cuts disproportionately awarded to the well-off; spending for the Viet Nam war and an increase in the armed services of 300,000; the creation of a large amount of temporary employment in government programs like the Neighborhood Youth Corps.

There is no reason today to be confident that this society will know what to do with 5 million drop-outs in 1975. Obviously, we should be preparing an economic substitute for the war in Viet Nam if that tragic conflict should happily come to an end. Thus far we have not yet really faced up to the consequences of a poverty population which is so very young.

But, then, it is not simply the young who are the special victims of poverty today. In a time when we have proclaimed a national goal of equal rights for all, the massive and discriminatory workings of the economy could effectively nullify all our civil rights laws and keep Negroes and other minorities in second-class citizenship.

The trends of the present and immediate past are familiar to most socially concerned Americans. Because of racial prejudice, Negroes were among the last of the Americans to enter into the mass production mainstream of the economy. Arriving in the plants at a time of automation and chronic recession, they were the "last hired and first fired." Progress was made in World War II when war jobs allowed Negroes to reduce the discriminatory distance between what they were paid and the white wage. But in the 1950s, this hopeful trend stopped and perhaps even went into reverse. So today, on the average, black Americans receive just a little bit more than half of the pay of white Americans.

This is an existing and intolerable outrage. But the newest government figures suggest that things could be even worse in the future.

The National Commission on Technology, Automation and Economic Progress, set up by Congress and composed of businessmen, trade unionists and scholars, reported to the President earlier this year. It said, among other things, that "if non-whites continue to hold the same proportion of jobs in each occupation as in 1964, the non-white unemployment rate in 1975 will be five times that of the labor force as a whole. . . ."

It is already a scandalous fact about American society that Negro unemployment is twice that of white (and that joblessness among Negro teenagers is at 25 percent, or Great Depression rates). But now an authoritative Commission tells us that, unless there is a gigantic upgrading of the Negro workforce, this miserable situation is going to get more than twice as bad as it is now!

But, then, the Automation Commission went on, if we continue our present efforts to help non-white Americans, things will not be so bad. Negroes will "only" be two and a half times more unemployed than whites in 1975. In other words, the current national effort to help the Negro win full economic citizenship could, after nine years of activity, leave us with an increase in Negro joblessness, up from double at present to two and a half times that of whites. Thus it is clear the growth potential of poverty will victimize Negroes more than anyone else and that the most terribly abused citizen of this society today and tomorrow is the young Negro who most deserves our help.

All of these enormous problems are compounded by the incredible fact that it is precisely these defenseless and victimized youth and Negroes who are not given the most basic federal protections.

There are, for example, more than 17 million jobs not covered under minimum wage and they are precisely in the areas where the drop-outs and racial minorities desperately try to find work. There are 3½ million retail trade jobs, almost 2 million restaurant jobs, a million positions in hospitals, 2 million for domestics, which are beyond the pale of the law.

Thus when one hears that new openings in the service industries are taking the place of the jobs not being created on the assembly line, it is good to remember that one is often talking about new poverty jobs not even covered by minimum wage. And there is, of course, the subsidiary scandal that many of the jobs which are covered by minimum wage keep the worker in poverty.

At the beginning of this article, I pictured a poor family at the table with the father as a full-time worker. That is because 52 percent of the heads of poor families in 1963 were employed—and 64 percent of them had at least some employment during the course of the year. In other words, it is quite possible to put in a full 52-week year on the job and to be able to provide your children with only 22 cents apiece for each one of their meals, or less. The 22 cents is for the better-off poor.

These last figures contradict the cynical American image of the poverty-stricken: as loafers, welfare chiselers, spivs. But what about those poor people who don't work? Aren't they wastrels and do-nothings?

In point of fact, it is only a minority of the non-working poor who receive any help from federal, state or local funds. According to the 1966 report of the Council of Economic Advisers, in 1964 only 7.3 million of the poor, about one-fifth of the total, received any public assistance payments. And, to emphasize the heartlessness of these programs, in June of 1965, 11.5 million poor children and their 7 million parents, plus about 3.5 million aging poor persons, were receiving nothing at all.

Indeed, the Council reports the ironic situation where, in 1965, there was more public aid, assistance and money for the people who were not at all poor (they got $20 billion) and for those just above the poverty line ($10 billion for them) than for those who were living in the very depths of poverty itself (they got $10 billion, or only 25 percent of the total of public transfer programs).

This is not, however, to say that those who were lucky enough to get some kind of assistance were living high on the hog. As the Economic Advisers put it, "Most persons now receiving assistance do not receive enough to enable them to live at even a minimum income level." A typical mother with three children gets a budget which allows the grand sum of $1.15 a day per person for food, shelter, clothing and all the other necessities of life.

This situation was probably one of the reasons that the Automation Commission recommended that the President investigate the possibility of guaranteeing an annual income to every citizen. For clearly a society whose national product is increasing by about $50 billion a year can afford to eliminate the scandal of poor children who get no help at all from society and others who receive utterly inadequate assistance. We are rich enough to guarantee every citizen the right to the necessities of life.

Here, then, starting off from that 95-cent meal for four of the best-off of the poor, is the world of American poverty. If one takes a narrow definition of a "poverty line," then it is possible to applaud our statistical progress. But if one understands that we confront a subculture, a magnetic field of misery, then things do not look so bright, for we are talking about 50 million Americans, 22 million of them children. In these terms, there will not be ultimate success in the war against poverty until every citizen is not simply across the "line" but also is insured from even the fear of falling into a situation where he must again choose between necessities like food, clothing or medicine.

Second, the most shocking thing we have learned about poverty in the course of the last two years is that it is a tragically youthful phenomenon: there are between 15 and 22 million potential heads of poor families who are now poor and under 18 years of age.

Third, the slowing down, or even the reversal, of Negro progress vis-a-vis whites is not a temporary phenomenon. If we are complacent and do not step up our efforts, the Automation Commission tells us that things will get worse for the black American, that in the midst of a political revolution for civil rights, there will be a counter-revolution of economic and social civil wrongs.

Fourth, the most victimized of our citizens are generally in jobs that are not afforded the most minimal protection of minimum wage—and we tolerate a poverty minimum wage in any case.

Fifth, if the average poor head of a family works hard and long, the average poor person who is out of the labor market does not even receive public assistance.

Given these few determinants of the nature of American poverty, there is no cause for celebration in the very modest gains we have made. There remains this world of the 50 million. There remains the fact of a meal for four persons which costs 95 cents—or half of that, or a quarter. The bread of poverty still has a bitter taste.

THE WAR ON POVERTY A 'GIANT STRIDE' FORWARD

by Sargent Shriver

Neighborhood Youth Corps

The national war on poverty is now in its eighteenth month. And we are winning that war. Not as rapidly as we would like to but faster than we thought possible when the Office of Economic Opportunity was created by law and charged with attacking chronic poverty on a broad front.

Since November 1964, the federal government, through the OEO and other executive agencies, has spent more than $2 billion. A huge sum but a mere fraction of the cost of sending men into space and very close to profits reported by one American corporation last year. Or about one-eighth the cost of conducting the war in South Viet Nam for a like period of time.

But the mere expenditure of money is no yardstick by which the accomplishments of these first eventful and often hectic months of this war can be measured. Those of us who have been directly engaged are far more concerned with the gains made in this relatively short period. We knew that a war to eradicate poverty from the United States—something no other nation in world history has ever attempted—would be a long struggle. And it will be. How long and how much the cost will be are calculated guesses. It will be a long journey, perhaps 20 years, and the cost will be high, but far cheaper than suffering about 17 percent of our citizens to remain in the degradation of poverty.

Considering the magnitude of poverty in our society, one might say we have "only scratched the surface." But we feel we have taken that first giant stride that is the most important step of the journey.

During 1965, 2.2 million people in the United States moved out of the poverty class. This reduced the number of people living in dire poverty to 32 million, which is still a shocking number of poor people. But we are making inroads. The next year should bring an even more marked decline.

Obviously, there are many reasons for this encouraging development. Our private economy has never been healthier. Since March 1964, the unemployment rate has dropped from 5.4 percent to 3.8 percent. Last year, our economic growth generated 2.5 million new jobs, including a million jobs for teenage Americans. Meanwhile, the wages of the average worker went up by more than 3 percent.

The conditions for making a successful and many-pronged attack on poverty were never better. And the results of these efforts speak for themselves.

Statistics quoted by the yard will not show the spirit of the people who have stepped forward to enlist in this war:

- There were 250,000 volunteers who worked in the Head Start school program last year. They made possible the resounding success of this pre-school effort for 600,000 underprivileged children.
- Right now, more than 15,000 citizens, rich and poor, representing every race, every religion, every profession, every trade, are helping to oversee the programs in their communities in an effort to help the poor people who want to better themselves.
- Nearly 300,000 teenagers from the poor among the rural and urban communities want to get into the Job Corps.
- There are now 10,000 Protestant, Catholic and Jewish women, Negro and white, working together through their own volunteer organization, Women in Community Service, formed only late last year.
- More than 30,000 Americans of all ages have applied to become Volunteers in Service to America (VISTA), our domestic Peace Corps, even though we can offer VISTA volunteers wages that are often lower than the income of many of the poor with whom they will serve. Some 2,000 Volunteers are now serving in urban slums, in migrant labor streams, on Indian reservations, in Appalachian hollows.

There is no intention here to convey the idea that the war on poverty is being waged exclusively by the OEO. Many other federal and local agencies are conducting various phases of this broad attack, some in concert with OEO, others independently. Every undertaking that reduces economic need among our people is a part of this war. Even a partial list must include: The redevelopment program for Appalachia, low cost housing, the Manpower Development and Training Act, the new education bills, the improvement and enlargement of the coverage of social security, medicare, the minimum wage law, unemployment compensation, the Older Americans Act, the Economic Development Administration.

These first 18 months are indeed just the beginning. But it has been an encouraging start. Our accomplishments in this brief span have not been limited to psychological and spiritual results. The human impact on entrenched poverty has already brought lasting changes and benefits to poor people. Here are some of them:

- It has reached more than 3 million poor people directly with jobs and other kinds of services they did not have before.
- It has involved more than 5,000 residents of the areas served by the poverty programs on community action boards, fulfilling the congressional requirement for the maximum feasible participation of the poor in choosing the best means for the eradication of poverty in their own localities.
- It has enrolled more than 600,000 pre-school children in Head Start classes in less than one year.
- It has provided jobs for more than a half-million teenagers through the Neighborhood Youth Corps projects.
- It has approved more than 5,000 separate money grants for Community Action Projects, covering every state in the Union and more than one-third of all the counties and more than one-half of the 182 poorest counties.

The Community Action Program has been and will continue to be the main attack in this war on poverty. It alone consumes more than half of all the funds allocated to the OEO. It has now clearly evolved from an experiment into an operational program. A new force working to shape the destiny of millions of the poor, bringing new vitality to community life in every state, Community Action is now a reality in more than 656 cities and towns and the number increases every day.

It requires coordinated action on the part of both the public and the private community agencies to carry out such a comprehensive program. For poverty has many faces. Poverty is not just low income; it is also wretched housing, inadequate education, lack of job skills, insecure family life and denial of access to the services which help to eliminate some of these problems.

Community Action can only succeed through the coordinated efforts of both private and public agencies. No one agency has the know-how to tackle all the problems that beset the poor. Effective local anti-poverty action needs the help of the churches, the established welfare agencies, employment offices, settlement houses, schools, youth groups, veterans organizations, labor unions—representatives of all the moving forces in the whole community and, of course, the poor themselves. For the poor should assist in determining what priorities are placed on their needs, which programs will work best and what techniques are most likely to bring the desired results.

I would like to emphasize here that the participation of the poor themselves is one thread that runs through the Community Action plans. Not only is this a requirement of the basic law authorizing the war on poverty, but this provides an important insight into problems of poverty—the kind of insight which comes most meaningfully to those who have experienced real poverty.

Today, more than 21,000 poor people are employed directly in our Community Action agencies. It is expected that some 45,000 poor will be employed in this summer's Head Start programs. And, by the end of 1967, it is anticipated that more than 100,000 poor persons will be employed as teachers' aides, child supervisors, clerks and in other subprofessional jobs which can lead to careers outside the anti-poverty program.

A look at several important programs may be the best way of understanding the war on poverty.

The Job Corps

On January 15, 1965, a little band of 30 youths arrived at a refurbished Civilian Conservation Corps camp in the Catoctin Mountains of western Maryland. They were the first of more than 20,000 young people, including 1,600 women, in one of the more spectacular programs of the war on poverty.

By July 1966, the total is expected to reach 30,000 and in 1967 it will reach the 55,000 mark.

For all of them, who populate nearly 100 residential Job Corps Conservation Centers, as well as urban centers throughout the country, the goal is the same: To prepare for jobs in which they can earn, at the least, a decent living and to become responsible citizens.

To that end, these less privileged young men and women, these school dropouts and jobless youths from age 16 through 21, get basic education, training and work skills.

They receive full maintenance and health care, a modest living allowance and a readjustment allowance when they have completed their training. In addition, they are encouraged to make allotments of $25 per month, which is matched with a like sum from the Job Corps, to help support their families. To date, in the brief life of the Job Corps, these allotments total more than $3.5 million.

Their training in Job Corps Centers is in dozens of vocations for which there is demonstrated need and which will not displace presently employed workers.

Already these young people of the Job Corps have made enviable records in becoming part of their neighboring communities. They have fought fires and floods, planted trees and cleared sites for recreational areas, harvested crops, done many charitable deeds, given blood and, literally, saved lives. All this has been accomplished while they pursued their main objective—to become qualified workers.

As of February 28, 1966, more than 1,000 had left the program after completing their training. Nearly half went directly into jobs; about a third entered the armed forces (although four in every ten had previously been rejected because they failed the physical or mental tests); and the remainder returned to school, with ten of them in college.

To date, more than 4,300 business firms have expressed interest in interviewing Job Corps graduates for approximately 13,000 jobs.

By mid-summer 1966, the Job Corps will be graduating thousands of young men and women monthly and more than half of them are expected to go into jobs awaiting them in industry. The remainder will return to school or enter the armed forces. All, however, will have been reclaimed from the almost certain dead-end life of those without trades, without education and without even hope for a better life.

Project Head Start

Project Head Start is OEO's program to give preschool children from economically and cuturally disadvantaged backgrounds and their families the education, medical care and social services they need.

Designed initially to enroll 100,000 children in an eight-week summer program in 1965, more than 600,000 children eventually took part, in 2,400 communities in all 50 states and the territories. So successful was the undertaking that, at its conclusion, President Johnson announced its extension to include a year-round program, follow-through on summer Head Starters and a further summer program.

With a budget of $180 million for fiscal year 1966, over 100,000 children are now enrolled on a year-round basis and a further 500,000 are expected to participate in the coming summer program.

Organized and administered by local communities, with financial assistance from OEO, each Head Start center provides the children with full medical and dental examinations, psychological, nutritional and social services. Parents are encouraged to take part in every phase of the program, to work as teacher aides and to attend special courses in home economics, food budgeting and buying, child care and improving the home environment.

OEO is now seeking an increased budget for Head Start of $310 million for fiscal year 1967. With these funds, we can enroll 200,000 children in full-year programs and 500,000 in a summer program.

The Future of the War on Poverty

The increasing demands to support our military efforts in South Viet Nam have forced President Johnson to increase the war on poverty more slowly than might otherwise be the case. But he has recognized that this anti-poverty program can and must go forward.

We have asked the Congress to authorize $1.75 billion to continue the OEO programs. This compares with $1.45 billion this year for comparable programs.

There is a natural inclination to associate the war on poverty with the civil rights revolution. Poverty claims victims in all race groups. Indeed, the majority of the poor in America are white. But one-half of the non-white population is poor and the solutions to the overall problem of poverty are closely related to the lowering of the barriers to equal civil rights. Poverty cannot be substantially eliminated until the galling problems of discrimination are more nearly solved.

Our requests for the future funding of this vast undertaking are now under consideration in the Congress. It would be presumptuous for me to assume Congress will do exactly what has been requested. However, it is obviously my earnest hope the war on poverty will not be slowed either by reductions of funds or other crippling restrictions. We need every program and dollar we have asked for.

Should the Congress agree with our requests, and authorize the expenditure of $1.75 billion, during fiscal year 1967 we will be able to:

- Allocate $533 million for the programs permitting the enrollment of a total of 45,000 youths in the Job Corps and provide jobs for 354,000 young people in the Neighborhood Youth Corps.
- Fund the Community Action Program in more than 900 localities with $944 million. This includes extending Head Start programs to 700,000 children and adult basic education to 75,000 participants.
- Set aside a total of $65 million to expand the programs for migrant farm workers and to provide loans to some 15,000 low income rural families and 400 local cooperative associations.
- Provide $5 million for small business loan programs to provide screening, counseling, management guidance or similar assistance through 120 small business development centers in 70 areas of the country.
- Earmark a sum of $160,000 for work experience programs serving 105,000 impoverished individuals.
- Enlarge the VISTA program through the allocation of $26 million, which will enable us to increase the number of volunteer workers to 4,500 as against approximately 2,000 now working among the poor.

What we have planned and the money we have asked for will not solve the poverty problem in 1967 but it will enable us to keep winning this war.

This war on poverty will go on. It will continue to be noisy, visible, often dirty, uncomfortable and sometimes politically unpopular. For grinding poverty itself is not a pretty, neat or nice affair to those afflicted by it. But this war will be won.

LABOR'S ROLE IN THE WAR ON POVERTY

by David Sullivan

The nation's anti-poverty program can live up to its highest promise if all union members become involved in it at the grass roots—in the cities and counties where the battle must be fought.

For years, organized labor has fought for social progress by electing liberal legislators and by keeping in touch with them through its legislative efforts. But this is no longer enough.

For the national war on poverty is different. Unlike the New Deal programs which were largely carried out by federal, state and local government staffs, the Great Society program is to be directed largely by local citizen organizations known as community action agencies, working in conjunction with governmental and private programs.

Seeing that the program reaches the poor is a job which cannot be done by Sargent Shriver's Office of Economic Opportunity alone. We have to help—or it will not work.

OEO wants our help. AFL-CIO leaders have been involved in the Office of Economic Opportunity's plans from the very beginning. And union leaders are still involved in giving advice on the program at the very highest level.

The AFL-CIO also has been developing an administrative structure to work with the Office of Economic Opportunity. Miles Stanley heads all these activities. He has been having some success persuading AFL-CIO state and local central bodies and international unions to appoint coordinators of their anti-poverty activities. Many local central body officials now serve on the governing boards of local community action agencies. They are supported by Miles Stanley's office and by the other staff departments of the AFL-CIO, each of which has been assigned special responsibility for one or more OEO programs.

The AFL-CIO Anti-Poverty Office works closely with the Job Corps and Community Action Programs. The Department of Research covers the Neighborhood Youth Corps and rural, small business, manpower, public works and regional development plans.

The Department of Education works especially with the college work-study program, adult basic education, project Head Start, vocational education and public education.

The Department of Community Services concentrates on Consumer Education and Legal Services programs and Volunteers in Service to America.

The Department of Social Security deals with work-experience programs.

So both the AFL-CIO and OEO have developed and are continuing to build administrative machinery to back up labor's efforts.

In the power structure of a typical American community, the poor, while having many sympathizers, do not have many natural allies among organizations. But AFL-CIO affiliates are such natural allies. The poor have a right to expect labor to lead in the fight to reduce poverty. After all, that has been the historic role of unions in America and poor people know it.

DAVID SULLIVAN is President of the Building Service Employes International Union and a Vice President of the AFL-CIO. He serves as Chairman of OEO's Labor Advisory Council.

Labor and OEO

Organized labor is represented on the National Advisory Council of the Office of Economic Opportunity by A. Philip Randolph, President of the Sleeping Car Porters and Miles Stanley, Director of the AFL-CIO Anti-Poverty Office.

President David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes is chairman of OEO's Labor Advisory Council. The other 12 members are:

- Finlay C. Allen, Vice President, Carpenters;
- Peter Brown, Special Int'l. Representative of State, County and Municipal Employes;
- Milton Fried, Director of Research, Clothing Workers;
- Nathaniel Goldfinger, Director of Research, AFL-CIO;
- Max Greenberg, President, Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union;
- C. J. Haggerty, President, Building and Construction Trades Department;
- Leonard Lesser, Assistant to the President, Industrial Union Department, AFL-CIO;
- Leo Perlis, Director, Community Services Department, AFL-CIO;
- M. Vernie Reed, Vice President, Laborers;
- Larry Rogin, Director, Department of Education, AFL-CIO;
- Barney Weeks, President, Alabama Labor Council, AFL-CIO;
- Hunter P. Wharton, President, Operating Engineers.

OEO is developing further union participation through a labor liaison staff. Thomas J. Cosgrove, former education director of the State, County and Municipal Employes, is Executive Secretary of the Labor Advisory Council. His chief function is to generate fuller union participation. He will be aided by a labor liaison staff at OEO's Washington office and its seven regional offices.

SURVEYING – "Real Man's Work"

Forty-five hard-nosed young men fired with "desire" are combatting the elements and their own suspicions to win permanent places in the ranks of those who work on America's biggest construction jobs.

Behind them lie poverty and hopelessness. Ahead is a sound economic future, with good jobs that pay well—and a sense of accomplishment.

They are the survivors of an often uncertain and usually doubting group in upstate New York that accepted the challenge of Operating Engineers Local 545 to prepare themselves for "real man's work in the outdoors," work which could be cold or wet but was interesting and profitable.

They are undergoing training as surveyors' aides in a Neighborhood Youth Corps project sponsored by the local and the New York State Department of Public Works. Since the initial shakedown, they've been doing so well most of them will be put to work before finishing their scheduled 21 weeks of instruction.

The project was developed by Local 545, with help from the international union, to fill a widening shortage of men qualified to work in surveying gangs—everything from rod and chainmen to chiefs of party.

The trainees were recruited from three areas—Buffalo, in the western area; Syracuse, in the central section and Keeseville, in northern New York. The instruction is given by experts from the union's ranks in each location.

The project got off to a difficult start. The very first day brought temperatures of 20 degrees below zero and 18 inches of snow to Keeseville and only seven of the 16 young men who had signed up managed to make it the opening morning. But by afternoon another seven had appeared and 12 of the group slept in the classroom overnight rather than take a chance on not getting through the snow the following day.

But there had been difficulties before that. The prospects, from homes with incomes of no more than $3,100 a year, were screened by the area employment service offices. They were supposed to have completed the 10th grade and to know algebra or geometry, or to be prepared to complete these subjects during the training period. But some with no more than eighth grade backgrounds appeared and the instructors, undaunted by their lack of schooling but impressed by their earnestness, accepted them. In most cases, they have proved adept pupils and have done as well as their colleagues.

Tentative plans had called for 60 trainees, 20 from each area, but it proved impossible to recruit that many youths who had minimal requirements and were willing to face the admitted hardships. By the time the first classes were ready, only 37 had been accepted. The rolls were kept open for three weeks, there were comings and goings and, at the end of the fourth week, there were 10 trainees at Buffalo, 19 at Syracuse and 20 at Keeseville—a total of 49. Four have since been sent to jobs.

The toughest job for the union, the teachers and the highways department was to convince the trainees that somebody was interested in them and their future. Once that hurdle was taken, things have gone about as smoothly as they can in such a program.

The highways department provides a center in which the trainees assemble and trucks to transport them to the spots where they may be doing the preliminary work on laying out highways, conservation lines and access roads and firebreaks in state forests and parks and staking the foundations of future buildings.

The youths, who often never had two dimes to rub against each other, are paid $1.25 an hour for 32 hours training each week. When they're ready, they will step into jobs under union contracts that pay from $2.175 to $2.65 an hour. The union thinks many of them will do a lot better than that if they continue to apply themselves as they have been—and that 15 to 18 of them might end up as chiefs-of-party, or boss of surveying teams, whose earnings run a lot higher.

Surveying trainees, who do a different job each day, are shown how to make adjustments on the "gun."

Oakland Labor Backs Up Youth

by Max Awner

Oakland is a city of contradictions. A near-metropolis of 385,000 people, it is an ugly-duckling sister to glamorous San Francisco eight miles across the bay.

Oakland is a key industrial center and world headquarters of the progressive Kaiser Industries. Yet just a few blocks from the modern Kaiser skyscraper stands the Florentine tower of the Oakland Tribune, property of former Senator William F. Knowland, known as "Mr. Right-to-Work" throughout California.

The physical contrast runs from the elegant residential neighborhoods of East Oakland's wooded hills to the decaying ghetto-slums fringing downtown.

Add to this potpourri of contradictions just one more. A city governed by a notably unimaginative municipal administration, brazenly bullied by a sadly benighted publisher, is also the home of one of the most imaginative and progressive central labor bodies in the AFL-CIO family—the Alameda County Central Labor Council. And thereby hangs this tale.

Alameda County, which covers most of the so-called East Bay region, is one of the fastest growing counties in the state; its population recently topped the million mark. At the same time, it has been plagued with an unemployment rate consistently running 50 to 75 percent higher than that of the nation as a whole. Oakland, the county seat, has been especially hard hit. In 1964, the city's adjusted annual jobless rate was 9.6 percent. Though it has declined substantially since then—along with that of the rest of the country—it is still nearly double the national rate.

A grossly disproportionate share of Oakland's unemployment burden is borne by the one-third or more of its population who belong to racial minorities—the vast majority of them Negro. It has been estimated that as much as 20 percent of the city's employable Negroes are jobless. Nearly 10 percent of Oakland's population receive some welfare assistance; again a heavy majority of them are in the non-white community. No wonder a Chicago newspaper recently ran a banner headline: "A 'Watts' Festers in Oakland."

MAX AWNER, a veteran labor observer, writes on political and social problems from the west coast.

Such facts and figures long have troubled the leaders of the Alameda County Central Labor Council. Thus when the Economic Opportunity Act was enacted in 1964, they promptly grasped the opportunity to move against the poverty and inequity that almost everyone else was merely deploring or lamenting.

In May of 1965, the council submitted to the U.S. Office of Economic Opportunity a plan for a twelve-week summer job project under Title II of the Act. The plan envisioned employment of 200 youths in various types of community work, all under supervision of the labor council. The purposes of the project, as spelled out in the proposal, were as follows:

1. To provide "hard to serve" unemployed youth with a specific program of work training and experience;
2. To provide youth who would otherwise not qualify for jobs or standard apprenticeship programs a chance to earn money constructively;
3. To demonstrate that a task-oriented situation, with appropriate supervision, challenging work, realistic wages and worker involvement in planning can stimulate personal motivation and responsibility;
4. To provide maintenance, repair and rehabilitation services, through youth work teams, to organizations and agencies in the community of poverty who could not afford such services through normal private industry channels.

Last June 9, the OEO approved a grant of $235,761 for the project.

A project director and staff of supervisors and foreman-instructors were hired, largely from the ranks of retired or unemployed union members, and a list of proposed work projects was obtained from community non-profit agencies. Job requests were carefully screened as to social usefulness or need, variety and interest of the work involved and—very important—the inability of the agency requesting it to finance it privately. Projects were cleared with the unions concerned to ensure no jobs were taken from unionists.

Job applicants were sought through schools, church organizations, the state employment service, welfare rolls, youth centers—and police records. Requirements were: age 16 to 21, family income of not more than $4,000 a year for a family of four, less for a smaller family and willingness to work.

In general, the more bleak the family situation, the more unpromising the applicant's history, appearance, manner or personality, the better his chance of selection. Nevertheless, the task of recruitment was an agonizing one. In less than three days, nearly 700 had applied for the 200 openings. The 200 finally chosen —140 boys and 60 girls—represented what would normally be called the social dregs of the community. Nearly a third of them were on parole or probation or had previous police records—the sort of kids who nine times out of ten would be rejected by the typical social agency. About half were from broken homes. Most came from families receiving public assistance. A high proportion were school dropouts. About 90 percent were Negro.

Almost from the day the work began, June 28, it became clear the project was setting in motion profound changes in the lives of its youthful participants.

Early in the project's life, Labor Council Assistant Executive Secretary Richard Groulx reported to a council meeting that, despite the reputation that preceded them, nearly all the young workers were "courageous, deserving and sincere." He suggested that the mere prospect of decent jobs where they could bolster both the family income and their own self-respect had begun to change their outlook.

With few exceptions, the young workers tackled their tasks with zest and hustle. The work, and the prospect of regular $1.25 an hour wages, seemed to promote new feelings of self-respect, ambition and responsibility. Many opened bank accounts for the first time in their lives. They began to dress better, both on and off the job. A supervisor of a group of girls reported that her charges had matured remarkably in just a few weeks—"no more gum chewing and bubble popping and they've gained a new respect for themselves and each other." She added that most of them were planning to return to school in the fall—now that they had a little money for school clothes and supplies.

Another foreman, a member of a Teachers local, had this to say:

"At the beginning, we all agreed to treat them as young but mature men and women, not baby them the way we do in the schools. All of a sudden, they were proud of themselves—proud of themselves and the community."

Not the least significant aspect of the project was the effect it had on the foreman-instructors. Harold Wilson, the labor council's community services director who acted as overall project coordinator, reported:

"We conceived this project with the idea that experienced working men could guide kids in proper work channels. This has happened just as we foresaw. What we didn't foresee was how deeply the experienced workers would be affected, too. They've come to understand these kids and their problems; they've gotten not only involved but enthused."

About midway in the three-month project, a number of the youths were asked how they felt about the whole thing. Many answered that were it not for these jobs they would be walking the streets and very likely getting into trouble.

"Now I have money in my pocket that I worked for and it makes me feel good," wrote one, adding, "Why should it be so hard for us young people to find jobs?" Several said they were learning to do things they never imagined they could do and this contributed to their feeling of accomplishment and self-respect. One young man of 16, asked about problems of work and schooling, replied: "School may be free, but it takes a lot of money to get to it."

In October, the federal agency approved a second work-experience project submitted by the labor council. This one, at first set for six months, has been extended through next July. It has double the budget of the first project—some $500,000 in OEO funds, plus sizable local contributions in facilities and services. Financed under Title I of the Economic Opportunity Act—the Neighborhood Youth Corps section—rather than Title II, the Community Action Program, this project has enlisted some 365 young people.

The type of work is substantially the same and the rate of pay is only a little higher; $1.30 an hour as against $1.25 in the first project. But there is one notable difference: About a third of the youths in the new project are working only part-time—3½ hours a day, four days a week—and going to school the rest of the week. Thus they are being enabled to further their education and at the same time gain most of the benefits of a work-and-wages discipline. And though even a higher proportion of the second group came in as so-called "problem kids," the results, with the project approaching its termination, are just as encouraging, according to Director Paul Katz.

"These kids are living proof of the self-fulfilling prophecy theory," he says. "If you help them believe they're worth something, why, dammit, they turn out to be worth something."

Arming The Unemployed With Skills

by Robert B. Cooney

The improvised school is located in a refurbished industrial building within sight of the U.S. Capitol. Inside, the director finishes his cigarette and then purposely grinds it into the linoleum. By littering the floor, he is setting a good example for the staff. And a challenge for the students.

For this is the Custodial Training Project of the Building Service Employes Union. The Washington, D.C., program is a pilot project sponsored by BSEIU and its Locals 82 and 536 in cooperation with the U.S. Office of Education.

"Our main purpose in sponsoring this school," says BSEIU President David Sullivan, "is to secure jobs for unemployed workers after they have completed the 12-week course.

"The school represents a concrete effort to support President Johnson's War on Poverty. If it is successful, we hope to establish similar schools in other cities."

The "if" is unnecessary. The first group of 40 trainees is made up of people determined to succeed.

Every day, the students turn to and make the facilities sparkle. They are learning the techniques of efficient cleaning from experienced teachers. And, in remedial education classes, they are brushing up on English and basic math.

On the work skill side, they learn how to "strip" a floor, use mops and waxes, operate buffing machines and clean rugs and windows efficiently and carefully.

These trainees used to be hard-core unemployed or chronically unemployed. They don't plan to be any more.

Take William Henry Kinard. He is 41 years old, the father of 8 children. One is married, seven are still at home. He is determined that his children finish high school. He didn't.

Kinard left school at 15 "to help out at home." In 1943, when he was 18, he went into the U.S. Air Force. He spent 20 years in the service, rising to the rank of staff sergeant. Besides duty in the U.S., he served in England, Greenland, Alaska and on Guam.

In the Air Force, he was a tractor trailer driver, hauling fuel for jets and other aircraft.

"I am a good driver," says Kinard, a husky guy who looks like he could easily handle a tractor trailer. He feels his Air Force job was "a very skilled job—a very important job."

Yet he could not get on as a civilian driver. When he left the Air Force in 1963, he "knocked around from little job to little job." He applied at trucking companies but found "great big waiting lists."

He thought it would be easy to get a government job since he had veterans' preference. But he had trouble with the vocabulary tests when he applied for a guard's job at several agencies.

Kinard worked as a trash truck driver for a year but gave it up when doctors at Walter Reed army hospital told him it was adversely affecting his health.

Kinard was out of work two months when the U.S. Employment Service steered him to the new BSEIU training program.

Like all other students, Kinard receives $41 a week during the 12-week course, plus $5 for each dependent. With a maximum set at 6 dependents, his income totals $71 a week while in training.

Of the custodial school, Kinard says: "I think it is a good thing. You learn how to do things."

Learning the right techniques of cleaning take up the period from 10 am to 4:30 pm, with an hour for lunch. Then, from 4 to 6 pm, special remedial classes are held in math and English. These have been unusually popular.

The math course concentrates on practical problems, such as the current one of filling out income tax forms correctly. The English course helps the trainees brush away all the old cobwebs, build up vocabularies, improve sentence structure and discuss current events.

"I think it is a real good thing," declares Kinard. "And," he quickly adds, "especially if you don't have a high school education."

This lack has handicapped Kinard when he needed work the most. He left the Air Force with a half-pay pension of $133 a month, a sum which goes mainly for payments on his house. With veterans' preference on civil service tests, he thought he could find a job quickly. As he explains it:

"I thought it would be easy to get into the government, but I soon found out that without a high school education you are wasting your time."

Kinard said he needs a steady job badly at this time in his life because, "while the pension helps, I want my children to at least finish high school."

For Mrs. Viola Brown Colbert, 51, there are similar reasons for wanting to acquire enough skills to hold a steady job. She needs a regular income to keep her children in school and make their opportunities better than hers.

Mrs. Colbert's 18-year old daughter, Linnette, is in her first year at Howard University and her 17-year old son, Eddie Leroy, Jr., is completing high school and wants to go on to college. They are their mother's pride and joy.

Looking back, Mrs. Colbert has seen a life of "trial and tribulation" which she feels has given her the strength to survive adversity. She was born in Georgia and grew up in the South.

When her husband went into the service in World War II, Mrs. Colbert went to night school and graduated from the 8th grade at the age of 30. After the war, her husband came down with tuberculosis and died in 1952 after four years of illness.

Mrs. Colbert was a laundry worker for 12 years until she injured her arm in 1962. She had been making $1.25 an hour and then received small workmen's compensation payments for 7 months while under doctor's care.

She owns her own house and has managed by renting out rooms, aided by a $53 monthly dependents' benefit for her children.

Mrs. Colbert is now seeking steady work so she can pay off a loan to keep her daughter in college and enable her son to start college next fall. She was referred to the custodial school by USES.

"I am enjoying every minute of it," Mrs. Colbert said of the school's program. She enumerated the techniques of cleaning she learned and the equipment she can now operate and added: "I want to do a good job when I go out."

Of the remedial courses, Mrs. Colbert is convinced they will help her improve her English and arithmetic.

Of the school itself, she said this:

"I think they got something good here for us, especially the poor class of people.

"You can't get the people out of the slums until you get the slums out of the people. People can do better if they have the education and proper help and money to pull out."

To Mrs. Colbert, "life has been a struggle." This training, she feels, will help her "get another start."

Now William Kinard and Mrs. Colbert and their fellow trainees and the trainees to come have strong allies.

Project Director Michael Nash, the man who litters the floor on purpose, is proud of the trainees after just one month's operation. He said 11 trainees have been placed on part-time jobs at $1.45 an hour.

Nash, who has rejected offers of $1.25 an hour for the trainees, intends to develop a roster of employers offering the best pay and conditions. The BSEIU locals oversee the program and plan to keep in constant contact with graduates to back them up on the job.

For these men and women are becoming workers with skills to offer—and they know it.

Community Action in Cincinnati

by Al Bilik

On the heels of a successful march organized by the Cincinnati Action Committee for Civil Rights (CAC) in October 1963, the realization came to many of us in CAC that future steps in the long trek forward inevitably would involve economic as well as equal opportunity. Significantly, the theme of the March in Cincinnati became "Jobs and Freedom."

When hearings were begun in the Congress on the nature and extent of poverty in America, a similar investigation was urged on Cincinnati City Council's Public Welfare Committee. The chairman of the Welfare Committee was Theodore M. Berry, then a councilman and a member of CAC and now Director of Community Action Programs in the U.S. Office of Economic Opportunity. Hearings were held, task forces appointed and reports were made to the Welfare Committee in September 1964 just as President Johnson signed the Economic Opportunity Act.

It was quickly proposed that a Community Action Program be established under Title II of the Act. In a matter of weeks, a non-profit corporation was created, officially sponsored by six agencies: the City Council, Board of County Commissioners, Board of Education, Community Chest, Chamber of Commerce and the Cincinnati AFL-CIO Labor Council.

The head of each organization automatically became a member of the Board of Trustees of the Community Action Commission which, not by coincidence, is known as CAC.

As a starter, these six were empowered to appoint 15 additional trustees, several of whom as it turned out also were members of the board of CAC for Civil Rights. Berry, as Chairman of City Council's Welfare Committee, was one of these. The executive director of the Council of Churches and the representative of the Archbishop were two more. Another was a UAW staffer who serves also as chairman of the Advisory Committee to the Apprenticeship Information Center.

Appointed, too, was a university economist who had been chairman of the Job Training Committee set up in 1962 under the Manpower Development and Training Act and who now heads the greatly expanded Manpower Training Committee of CAC. A representative of NAACP and CORE also were appointed.

Lacking machinery at the time to effectively reach into poverty areas for representation, we appointed the presidents of Residents Councils at two integrated co-op projects located in low-income neighborhoods. With the later development of neighborhood organization and thereafter the establishment of a delegate body known as the Metropolitan Community Action Board, four additional representatives are now elected by the Metropolitan group to serve on the CAC Board.

Although five of the six individuals originally responsible for appointing the 15 additional CAC trustees were associated with a political party that opposed the Economic Opportunity Act, the composition of the total board was such that Berry, a liberal, was elected CAC President. When Berry accepted the OEO post in Washington a few months later, I succeeded him as CAC President.

The Labor Council's role in CAC is in large part an attempt to maintain the liberal-labor-civil rights coalition that was formed in the civil rights CAC and that in fact has served nationally as the informal springboard for the passage of legislation we now seek to implement locally.

We are not content, therefore, with simple recognition and a "place" on the Board of Trustees. Such tokenism is at best protective and defensive; and at worst leaves to established social and political community power the ability to undermine a program theoretically designed to itself shake the foundations of established community power.

Labor has much to offer and much to gain. Who knows better than we how to organize? We have talked about the need to help the unemployed, the underemployed, the underpaid to organize themselves and through community action the opportunity now exists.

In Cincinnati, a member of the State, County and Municipal Employes is president of a neighborhood organization in one of the several low-income areas of the city. An IUE member assisted in organizing another such group in his neighborhood where no organization existed before. A Brewery Worker helps put out a community council monthly newspaper where he lives. These are organizations established initially by Community Action staff and funds or bolstered where previously in existence.

A Hotel and Restaurant Employes Union member is employed by a neighborhood project as a community organizer. He makes house calls, goes tavern to tavern, pool hall to pool hall, corner to corner, spreading the message of organization and services that are available.

And more. Through the neighborhood organizations and their central Metropolitan Community Action Board, issues that formerly erupted into crises now find a ready community-wide vehicle for action. And the power listens. The protest of a community council backed by the Metropolitan Board, regarding a plan to construct a school in an all Negro area, brought quick if not entirely favorable response from the school board. A proposal to build a stadium in a poor residential area drew a demonstration at City Hall and the plan was altered.

In the past, the only urban renewal program that included affected citizens in the planning process was that which involved downtown businessmen. A recently announced renewal project for a poor neighborhood prominently noted that the community council had been asked to appoint a committee to work with the planners.

The accent is more and more on the positive. Welfare allowances in Ohio today are based on 70 percent of what was needed for bare subsistence back in 1959. Work has started on a movement designed to impress the state legislature to act when it next meets in January. Because it is a statewide problem, local organizing has begun to reach out to similar neighborhood groups in other Ohio cities to form a common front.

Discussion is under way in some community councils on a project to promote voter registration in poor neighborhoods and there is no doubt this task will be undertaken in depth.

With organization and action the theme, we are hopeful that the unorganized working poor will be stimulated to seek out labor organization on the job. AFL-CIO members already involved in anti-poverty community work, backed up by other unionists living in these areas, should be able to launch effective drives among hospital workers, motel employes and others in low-paid employment.

Labor participation in Cincinnati's economic opportunity effort is not confined to the broad outlines of community action. Job training programs directly concern us and we are involved.

Another young man benefits by observing a craftsman.

A Machinist serves on the CAC staff, promoting and coordinating job development and job training projects funded through the OEO and the Labor Department.

The Cincinnati AFL-CIO Labor Council co-sponsors a unique program with the Neighborhood Youth Corps and the City's Urban Rehabilitation Division. This project puts together skilled union craftsmen, crews of youngsters and owner-residents of rundown houses in poor neighborhoods who qualify for rehabilitation grants of up to $1,500 from the Federal Housing Administration. Four local unions—the Painters, Plasterers, Carpenters and Cement Masons—supply craftsmen who, paid at the prevailing union rate, serve as foremen and instructors for crews of boys age 16-22 who receive $1.25 per hour.

This program has worked so well, and has been so well-received by all concerned, that the Labor Department is now being asked to approve an expanded two-year operation. It is the opinion of the program supervisor, who is an executive board member of the Plasterers local, that the project will be an effective source of apprentice referrals for the participating unions.

The rational transition from equal opportunity to economic opportunity is amply demonstrated in this project.

But the overwhelming significance of all that we do rests finally on how well we apply the principles of organized labor to community action. If we view it as just another "do-gooder" operation for the "underprivileged," then we will be content to take our "place" on yet another board, which this time will be dispensing federal charity.

If, on the other hand, we see in community action the simple extension of all that we claim is good in unions—equality, personal dignity, participation, cooperative action, the idea that we are our brother's brother and not merely our brother's keeper—if this be so, then we will be in a position to make a unique and lasting contribution toward the democratization of power in our urban communities.

From Retirement To VISTA

by Gervase N. Love

Many people facing retirement figure on climbing up on some shore to just while away their time and watch the world go by. But there also are many who find this pretty uncomfortable after awhile and yearn to dive back into the mainstream of things—or at least into one of the eddies along the banks.

That's the way it was with George Cottell, who spent more than 30 years as business manager of Local 437 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in Fall River, Massachusetts. He took time out to serve as state director of the Works Progress Administration during the New Deal and also spent four years recently as executive director of the city's Public Housing and Urban Renewal Commission.

After all those years of helping other people, Cottell at 71 might have been expected to find that shore pretty comfortable. Instead, he enrolled as a VISTA Volunteer and kept right on helping other people. Not only that, but when he finished his year of service he promptly signed up for another because "if I were not working now, I'd just be rotting away."

VISTA stands for Volunteers in Service to America and is made up of shock troops in the Office of Economic Opportunity's war on poverty. Its members man the frontlines in the slums, both urban and rural, in the migrant labor camps, on Indian reservations, in the mountain hollows that time and progress have bypassed. They do everything that can be done to help people who need help. They are given an allowance that covers shelter, clothing, food and transportation, get $75 a month for "incidentals"—a word that includes everything from haircuts to medicines—and are paid $50 a month, receiving a lump sum at tour's end.

GERVASE N. LOVE is an Assistant Editor of the AFL-CIO News.

After completing training at Camp Newhope, North Carolina, Cottell was assigned to the city welfare department in Hartford, Connecticut. He quickly established himself among those who needed help as a man who knew all the angles, and how to use them, when it came to finding a job, obtaining welfare services or hospital care, steering people into training opportunities and opening up other avenues of assistance.

In his first year, he located jobs for new-found friends who ranged from a gypsy king to a Puerto Rican who alternated between farm labor and welfare.

The gypsy had tried before on his own account, but it took Cottell's persuasiveness to land him on a payroll. The Puerto Rican, who had never earned more than $1.25 an hour as a seasonally-employed fieldhand, was unable to speak English although he understood it. Cottell got him a job in a rubber factory and a week later he was put on his own machine at $2.25 an hour.

"The boss was happy," Cottell recalls. "He told me: 'Bring me five more like him and I'll put them to work.' Until this job he had just worked in nurseries and done stoop labor in the tobacco fields—three weeks' work at $1.25 an hour and then back on welfare. Now he has a regular job and, more important, he has a future."

Cottell sees as the greatest problem in his work the few people he runs into who have come to regard welfare as a way of life. One of his clients was a woman whose crippled husband had died after they had been on relief for eight years. She applied for relief for herself, but Cottell gently induced her to strike out on her own. Now, after training, she is employed in the Public Library.

He arranged for the money to help an aged pensioner make repairs to his disintegrating house which were demanded by the city building department. He persuaded countless mothers and fathers to enroll their small children in the Head Start pre-school program. He obtained psychiatric care for a father and he visited neighborhood leaders to assure that families moving into their areas would be accepted.

What prompted Cottell to turn to VISTA?

"I have seen poverty . . . I wanted to do something to help people, and people in poverty need help. . . .

"You read books . . . and they tell you of the problem. But they don't give you the solution. I think that if you could take the people out of the slums, out of that environment and into a decent job, you will have licked the problem."

Union Centers for the AGED

by William F. Miller

Every weekday at 10 a.m. men and women in their 60s, 70s and 80s begin arriving at the Beckman Building, a union hall.

They are not looking for work or attending a union meeting. Many of them never belonged to a union.

The same scene is repeated daily on the West Side at Cleveland's new Cudell Recreation Center.

A passing motorist might wonder why these older people were going into the recreation center, the domain normally of young athletic boys and girls.

The two groups of senior citizens have two things in common: They are all retired and they have found interesting places to visit and to pass their time.

These senior citizens and other hundreds of them have the United Auto Workers and its concern over retired citizens to thank.

This concern has led to a pioneering effort on starting 70 retirement centers in the U.S. and Canada.

Cleveland has two successful UAW retirement centers that have operated with little fanfare for four years. The centers are open to everyone in the community. Attendance statistics show that fewer than 15 percent of the retirees who use the facilities ever belonged to the UAW.

The UAW spends nearly $750,000 a year nationally on its retirement centers program. It has a special department in Detroit to supervise the program and to start new centers. Charles E. Odell, who has just left as Director of the UAW's Older and Retired Workers Department to join the U.S. Department of Labor, said cities have found the centers a good way to use expensive facilities full-time.

The UAW centers here, as in many other cities, are financed not only by the union but also by the United Appeal. The city recreation department plays an important role, supplying arts and crafts instructors.

Nearly 800 members take part in such activities as bowling, art and hobby courses, songfests, parties, trips, square dancing, golf lessons, cards, pool, current event discussions and swimming.

But it is not all party and games. The members also work on community service projects.

The West Siders aided the Diabetes Association of Greater Cleveland and the Cleveland Division of Health in sponsoring hundreds of diabetes tests in the neighborhood. East Siders rounded up 300 persons to get X-rays given by the anti-tuberculosis society.

The East Side center uses a section of UAW Local 45's union hall. It is a modern building with large windows overlooking busy St. Clair Avenue. There are comfortable chairs, piped-in music, card tables, a piano, pool table and rooms for handicraft.

The West Side center was recently moved from the UAW Local 486's hall to the modern Cudell Recreation Center, a city facility.

"For many, the centers are the most important part of their retired life," Mrs. Sheila Sklar, director of the centers, commented. "The centers keep them in touch with the world."

The members are very proud of their centers and are quick to praise them.

"If many of us didn't come here we wouldn't know where to go," said 69-year-old Llewellyn Thomas.

At the East Side center, Walter Kateley, 84, is known as the man who likes to get lively discussions started. A retired graphic engineer from the state highway department, Kateley is chairman of the weekly cracker barrel program.

"It's all spontaneous and uninhibited," Kateley said. The debate sometimes gets heated and at times he steps in to cool down the participants.

"It's the best place in town to come to and you couldn't improve on it," added W. S. Hart, 73, a retired member of Local 45. He worked many years at General Motors' Fisher body plant here.

Hart, who has had experience in union matters, is chairman of the East Side grievance committee.

"When members have gripes they come to me and my committee tries to settle them," he explains.

For Walter Mann, 74, a retired postal clerk, the center is "a haven for lost souls."

Songfests are one of the most popular activities in the diversified program at the UAW retirement center.

APPALACHIA: Island of Poverty

by Miles C. Stanley

In an area the size and terrain of Italy, Austria and Switzerland combined, 17 million Americans live in physical isolation and hard-core economic privation.

We call it Appalachia.

Until a few years ago it was an area unnoticed, living with its century-old legacy of exploitation. Then, in the early sixties, the national spotlight swung to this area which cuts across parts of 12 states and Americans realized for the first time that the problems of poverty were much more than tidying up the "wrong side of the tracks" in one's hometown. Here, in Appalachia, it was apparent, a sizable segment of the entire nation was on the "wrong side of the tracks."

The economic and social ills of this 167,000 square mile "pocket of poverty," a 1961 government task force report had indicated, were more widespread and of far greater severity than could ever be met by conventional weapons and conventional methods.

The spotlight of attention had come to Appalachia with the findings of a special federal-state commission appointed by President Kennedy in 1963.

The commission had found that the people of West Virginia and the highlands portion of Alabama, Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, South Carolina, New York, Ohio, Tennessee, Kentucky and Georgia had much in common. They shared the blight of high unemployment, poverty, lack of education and insufficient tax bases.

At the same time, the commission found a paradox. Here was a land rich in natural resources. Abundantly endowed, much of it was covered with forests while below the surface were fabulous riches in minerals, including the source of almost two-thirds of the nation's coal supply. And, adding to the rich lushness of the area was a yearly rainfall well above the national average.

But these natural gifts, it was apparent, had been the cause of much of Appalachia's woe. These resources had brought exploitation which ravaged the forests, pockmarked the mountains with strip mines, turned mountain streams brown from the acids of pit mines and left endless miles of unpainted shacks where the human residue lived, abandoned to its fate.

Today in Appalachia, one out of every three families has an annual income of less than $3,000 per year—the minimum figure set by the federal government as a poverty level. At the other end of the economic scale, fewer than 9 percent of Appalachian families have incomes above $10,000 per year.

MILES C. STANLEY, Assistant to President George Meany, is in charge of the AFL-CIO Anti-Poverty Office. He also is President of the West Virginia AFL-CIO and serves on OEO's National Advisory Council.

Per capita figures are even more stark. While Appalachia has an average per capita income of $1,400, the average is $1,900 for the rest of America.

The root cause of this wide disparity in incomes is not difficult to trace. For the last century, Appalachia has had the bulk of its wealth extracted and shipped elsewhere.

Early in 1964, President Johnson sent to Congress a bill based on the needs outlined in the commission's report. From Congress came the Appalachian Regional Development Act which was signed into law on March 9, 1965.

"A new experiment in creative federalism," was President Johnson's description of the measure.

Under the Act, an Appalachian Regional Commission was created, made up of the governors from each of the 12 states and a federal co-chairman appointed by the President.

In their first meeting as a commission, the governors declared they would "formulate continuing comprehensive, coordinated plans and programs for the overall development of the region. . .

"The public investments made in the region shall be concentrated in areas where there is a significant potential for future growth and where the expected return on public dollars invested will be greatest."

Behind them, then, were the political barriers, the jealously guarded insistence that each state go its own way, working with federal funds where available or on its own where it had to. Here was common cause for the common good.

Congress provided for this common cause $1.1 billion in federal funds, to be spent with state and local monies for a network of development highways, regional health centers, vocational education and sewage treatment facilities. The funds also were to develop land treatment and erosion control as well as timber development and mining area restoration. Also provided was a water resource study and supplements for existing federal grant-in-aid programs.

First to get underway was highway construction, for which 80 percent of the funds were earmarked over a six-year period for 2,350 miles of highways to the "hitherto inhibited" areas.

There was also a timely accomplishment. Three months after the law took effect, the commission joined with the Office of Economic Opportunity to initiate a regional health program. Its first act was to ensure the continued operation of the ten Appalachia regional hospitals founded by the United Mine Workers. The joint effort won a $1.2 million grant which enabled the hospitals to continue operating.

Along with these important and necessary programs, there was a realization among Appalachia's concerned citizens, educators and labor unions that additional approaches would be needed to rally the human resources and talents of the area.

In October 1964, leaders of major unions and AFL-CIO state organizations, in conjunction with West Virginia University, sponsored an Appalachian Trade Union Conference in Charleston, West Virginia.

The conference objectives were to promote a greater degree of understanding of common problems and to explore methods by which the labor movement, working with other agencies, could make a maximum contribution. Out of its three-day meeting came the decision to form the AFL-CIO Appalachian Council. Shortly thereafter, it was formally established with representation from the AFL-CIO state councils of West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Maryland, Kentucky, Alabama, North Carolina, Virginia, Tennessee, Georgia and South Carolina.

As chairman of the Council, I directed that offices be opened in Charleston to work directly in the area and in behalf of programs that soon became realities under the Office of Economic Opportunity and the Appalachian Regional Development Act.

The responsibility of the Council, as well as the entire labor movement in Appalachia, is to work as a regional entity for the development of programs or the stimulation of projects. The labor movement can well use its strength and organizational skills at the community level to develop work training, neighborhood organizations, community health and welfare services, adult education and day-care centers.

To this end, the Council has undertaken the first labor-sponsored national program for the training of community action workers.

Developed in conjunction with the Office of Economic Opportunity, and financed by $270,000 in federal funds, the program provides for the Council to select people from all sections of the area to attend West Virginia University, where they are to be trained to develop community action programs in their home areas.

The 100 people now in training will return to their communities after initial studies are completed. Three times during the year-long program—a week each time—they will return to the University where their problems and successes are to be discussed.

In selecting candidates, each state central body worked with the local central bodies to seek out active trade unionists with a desire to explore new ideas. Among the qualifications necessary were a knowledge of trade union procedures, an ability to work with others and a willingness to make a commitment for the year-long program. The only compensation is for expenses and lost time during the four weeks of university study.

Through this pace-setting, pioneering effort, the Council is hopeful that a shortcut can be made across generations of educational neglect and community apathy to speed along community self-help programs. If successful in Appalachia, the program undoubtedly would be extended elsewhere.

"We would like to have the program in half a dozen different parts of the United States," OEO Director Sargent Shriver told the AFL-CIO convention in December 1965, "—in the Iron Range area, in the northeastern states, in the Ozarks, in the West, in the Rocky Mountains and in the South."

In Appalachia, the hope now is to apply the law of physics that it is easier to keep a mass in motion than to start it. Appalachia isn't moving yet, but it will and when the area overcomes a century of inertia the nation must be ready with programs to push it onward to its deserved position of equality in American society.

FULL EMPLOYMENT
The Major Weapon

The Administration's anti-poverty program—and the operations of the Office of Economic Opportunity—can do only little, in itself, to reduce the prevalence of poverty in America. However, it has focused national attention on this problem. Its emphasis on youth, education and vocational training represents an investment in people and holds out the hope to the impoverished that they can move out of poverty. The Community Action Program makes it possible to mobilize local communities on social issues. But all of these efforts can reduce poverty rapidly only if they are closely meshed with programs to provide jobs at decent wages, adequate social insurance and income-maintenance payments.

About one-half of the poverty problem is distinctly related to the lack of enough jobs at decent wages. The key to the solution of this major aspect of the poverty problem is job opportunities for all Americans who are able and willing to work, as well as effective collective bargaining and adequate minimum wage and unemployment insurance protection.

In this regard, increased public investment is essential—to create job opportunities in the expansion and improvement of public services and low-cost housing that are particularly needed by the poor.

Moreover, the extension of Fair Labor Standards Act protection to millions of low-wage workers—on the farms and in the cities—and establishment of a $2 an hour federal minimum wage are required as rapidly as possible.

THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL included this statement in its report to the AFL-CIO convention in December 1965.

The heads of about one-fifth of the impoverished families, in 1963, were 65 years of age or over. In addition, approximately one-half of the poor who lived alone were in that age group. About 20 percent of the poverty problem, therefore, is related to the aged—most of whom are too old to work.

For the aged poor, adoption of medicare and the 7 percent increase in social security retirement benefits in mid-1965 are of tremendous assistance.

But average monthly retirement benefits of about $132 a month for an aged couple, approximately $91 a month for a retired worker and $79 for a retired widow, are too low for decent living—particularly when about one-half of the recipients receive even lower benefits. In addition, many retired people receive no retirement benefits under social security because they did not work in covered employment.

The Citizens' Crusade

by Richard Boone

One of the basic premises of a democratic society requires the active participation of citizens in the formulation of policies and the implementation of programs. Effective government requires an effective constituency.

That is the premise on which the Citizens' Crusade Against Poverty is founded. It is designed to enlist the participation of all who are concerned—and no one should be unconcerned—with our nation's war on poverty. Its purpose is the mobilization of our national will in the massive effort that is being made to eliminate poverty in America.

The Crusade was established in convention in New York City on October 13, 1964. It embodies many different groups coming together to fight poverty. These include church and civil rights groups, farm organizations, labor unions, businessmen and student associations.

Three working commissions constitute the main channels into which the Crusade's efforts flow. They are the National Program and Policies Commission, headed by James Patton, former president of the National Farmers' Union; the Community Activity and Organization Commission, led by Dr. Eugene Carson Blake, Stated Clerk United Presbyterian Church in the USA; and the Public Information and Education Commission, headed by A. Philip Randolph, AFL-CIO Vice President and the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., chairman of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

Officers of the organization are President Walter P. Reuther of the United Auto Workers, chairman; Rabbi Richard Hirsch, Director of the Religious Action Center of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, secretary; and Jerry Anderson, Acting General Manager, National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, acting treasurer.

In its less than two years' activity, CCAP has already some notable achievements under its belt. Planning is well under way on a program to train 1,000 workers to help poor people help themselves to play a more active part in resolving the problems facing them. In being is an information network of more than 4,000 neighborhood block clubs, tenant councils, senior citizen's clubs, church groups and other grassroots organizations in poverty-stricken areas. The materials sent them are helping cut through the cumbersome procedures that inevitably surround governmental programs. The Crusade plans to reach 10,000 such groups by mid-summer.

It is the CCAP's resolve that the war on poverty in America will not fail because, in the words of an ancient historian, "No man was angry enough to cry out." We know that once Americans are aroused and "angry enough to cry out," the poor will find their own voice and the will to help themselves—and the immorality of poverty in America will be ended.

ments is needed to help lift the aged poor out of poverty. In addition, the aged poor require low-cost housing and community facilities, as well as a system of adequate benefits for those who were not covered by social security during their working years.

Among about 30 percent of the impoverished families in 1963, the husband was disabled, dead or absent. In almost all cases these families are headed by women, few of whom are employed.

For these poverty-stricken families, adequate public welfare payments or income-maintenance allowances are essential, as well as low-cost housing. Day-care centers are also needed to reduce the burden on the heads of these impoverished families and to enable them to find jobs, if they are willing and able to work.

A meaningful attack on the causes of poverty must deal effectively with the need for adequate income maintenance when unavoidable hardships destroy a family's ability to be self-supporting. No war on poverty can succeed unless adequate family income protection is provided for those who cannot be self-sustaining.

To provide decent safeguards for the families of those who are injured or killed at work, federal standards are needed to upgrade the archaic workmen's compensation systems of the states. Insurance for the families of breadwinners separated from payrolls by illness, now limited to four states and the railroads, must be improved and extended nationally.

The war on poverty requires a vast increase in the quantity and improvement in the quality of education, vocational training, health care, low-cost housing, consumer counseling and personal guidance services for low-income families. Without such efforts as a base, the avenues toward higher living standards will be blocked.

Adoption of the anti-poverty program, the Education Act of 1965 and legislation for health care centers are vital steps toward providing such public services that are especially needed by the poor. But these programs need to be expanded and additional measures adopted, such as a new GI Bill and a stepped-up work-study program.

A successful campaign against poverty will automatically do more for America's Negroes than for the population as a whole because they are such a disproportionate number of the nation's impoverished families; although Negroes are about 10 percent of the population, they are some 20 percent of the poor.

But more than that, by taking the necessary measures to reduce poverty, America will create the environment that can make possible an early end to the ugly fact of discrimination in American life.

In our work-oriented society, the key to solving most of the poverty problem is the opportunity to work at decent wages—the chance for the poor to lift themselves and their families out of poverty through gainful employment at a living wage. For the working poor and the children of all impoverished families, there is no other meaningful alternative.

A highly productive economy can provide full employment at decent wages. It can also provide the social insurance, income maintenance, educational opportunities, low-cost housing, public facilities and social services that are essential to lift the condition of those in need.

America has within its grasp the ability to wipe out poverty from its midst—except for the tiny number of hardcore, clinical cases that require prolonged mental health and medical care, in addition to social and economic measures.

In 1964 and 1965, the nation began new efforts to reduce poverty rapidly. These beginnings will succeed, however, only if they are pursued and expanded relentlessly. The resources for these efforts are amply available in the economy's vast and growing productive ability. And these efforts will pay off by building a broader mass consumption base for the national economy and by reducing the tensions that have been festering in American society.

Progress in Poverty

The Administration's well-advertised war against poverty is, on its first year's showing, a remarkable success. Its achievements already justify a forceful and steady expansion . . . .

It has not worked equally well in every circumstance. The war on poverty is most effective where it involves urban Negroes. It is least effective where it is dealing with white populations. The Economic Opportunity Act, and all of the reforms that it has set in train, are the direct consequence of the long struggle over civil rights.

But among the 30 million Americans defined as impoverished, three-quarters are white. The impact of the Opportunity Act is very largely concentrated upon the most desperately deprived, embittered and volatile slums. They happen to be heavily Negro. Clearly the Office of Economic Opportunity made the right choice. But it is necessary to understand that a choice was made. It was a choice forced by the limitations of the appropriations and lack of time for organization. But it was a choice that has excluded most of the people termed poor.

The poverty programs offer very little to the elderly, although the elderly comprise nearly a third of the poor families in this country. The great weight of the resources have been thrown into the programs for children and young families. Again, a choice was made.

The poverty programs are fully effective only where mayors and school superintendents welcome them. The cities with big, vigorous community action programs are those in which mayors are urgently attempting to work out a new style of city politics. They are the cities where the old ward organizations are collapsing and mayors are looking for new lines of communication into the slums and particularly the Negro slums. While the slums want a hearing at city hall, it turns out that the more alert city halls want to hear from the slums . . . .

The Economic Opportunity Act has set loose the powerful concept of the participation of the poor, as a bloc, in the affairs of the community. The poor used to have at least the advantage of numbers, but now they are the minority in a hugely middle class Nation. The Opportunity Act has not only provided the professional direction and staffing that this inarticulate bloc must have. It has also set off a great process of soul-searching and reorganization among numberless school systems, welfare agencies, colleges, hospitals, government offices and political parties. In the long run, these indirect effects may be the most telling . . . .

Dear Rudy:

I want to thank you personally and on behalf of the Alabama Labor Council for participating in the week end education conference in Sheffield. It was good to have someone of your training and experience to be on hand to handle the session on poverty.

You did a good job in getting the group opened up even though you had a frustratingly short time in which to attempt to piece together all the parts of the puzzle.

It was good to get to see you again. Thanks for your help.

A Local Union Education Committee

I. What Kind of Education? Both union education and education about the world in which we live. Both learning to understand the contract and the civil rights struggle. Both steward training and becoming a better informed voter.

II. Official Status for Education Committee. This Committee should be officially set up by the Union, having the approval of the membership and a close tie with the Executive Board, with the Chairman of the Education Committee either a member or a non-voting member of the Union's Executive Board.

III. Define the Job of the Education Committee. If the Executive Board has not done so, the Education Committee should thoroughly discuss, then draft such a definition of its scope, taking it to the Executive Board, then to the membership meeting for approval.

IV. Where should the Education Committee Start? Where the members' interests and needs are. Find this out by interviewing them, by a questionnaire, by informal discussions. Might ask each one what they consider the three most important is ues today are, or on hat aspects of the Union's operation they would like more information.

V. Program Planning.

1. Start Small. Only try to do one thing at first, and be sure the Committee succeeds in doing that well. Then tackle another.

2. Set Up Goals for One Year. Establish priorities, starting with the ones you are ready to do first and which are most urgent.

VI. Getting More Participation.

1. Divide up the jobs among all Education Committee members. Someone may want to specialize in one field, study and know more about workmen's compensation, for example, than others.

2. Involve new people, both new members and formerly inactive members, if possible, in different committee projects. Union members who are not yet ready to serve on a committee may be interested in helping on one project.

VII. Union Building Activities.

1. Planning for better membership meetings.

2. Working with new members.

3. Taking the union to the members -- home visiting.

4. Building local union committees.

5. Union Community Services Committee (especially union counselling).

6. Classes in parliamentary procedure, speaking at meetings, union counselling, steward training, union administration, labor history, collective bargaining.

7. One-day institute on crucial union problems.

8. Send delegates to summer institutes, week end conferences.

9. Special labor film show.

10. Put out a shop paper or frequent handbills on Union subjects.

11. Keep a membership card file showing union activities, interests, hobbies.

VIII. Fun and Recreation Ideas.

1. Special film showings -- sports, recreation, travel, conservation.

2. Picnics, outings, ball games and parties for members and their families.

3. Dances and rallies. Education Committee might have a table or display even at a party or picnic.

4. Dance classes for members, hobby shows, white elephant sales.

IX. Other Education Activities.

1. Speakers or meetings on such topics as U. S. foreign policy, the war in Viet Nam, civil rights, the state legislature, how a bill becomes a law -- in our state, or in Congress.

2. Special classes or week end institutes on human relations as applied to union work, how to lead discussions, automation, politics and the Union, the changing South, community relations.

3. Promote reading on issues in cooperation with the City Library.

TIPS ON DISCUSSION LEADING

I. Types of Discussion Groups.

This is a simple breakdown of discussion groups based on the role of the leader. There are a lot of other ways discussion groups could be classified. And the three main classifications below might well overlap each other -- indeed, it would be easy for a group to go through phases of all three in one discussion.

A. Leader Oriented -- The discussion leader provides information, directs questions, gives the appearance of being "in charge," may well be in front of the group. The leader combines the role of expert and being the mechanic that keeps the discussion going. Many teaching situations are of this sort.

B. Resource Oriented -- The discussion is built around the information, experience, or even opinion of an expert resource person. The resource person may help conduct the discussion, or the mechanics of the discussion may be left to a chairman or leader. Panel discussions are of this type. In steward training you might wish to use this form when discussing rate grievances or legal problems.

C. Group Oriented -- Naturally, in each of these types of groups we are concerned about the whole group. But in this form of discussion the leader attempts to take as little active part as possible. He doesn't pose as an expert. He attempts to get information and help in running the discussion from the group participants. The leader becomes a kind of human relations mechanic. This can be a useful device in many groups. Sometimes, the nature of the group and the problem is such that this is the best method. It is recommended that you try this approach occasionally for some of the following reasons: (1) to see how it works; (2) to break the routine; (3) to get greater participation from the group; and (4) to improve your observation of what is happening in the group -- understanding both the group and individuals.

II. Some Points Regarding Leaders.

A. The leader is very important -- even when keeping his own expertness (and authority) in check in order to get participation, thought, and the exchange of experiences; his role is the key to successful discussion.

B. Attitude of Discussion Leader

1. Towards People -- friendly, feel that they are important and so their ideas and experiences are important. Similarly, the members of your group are important enough that you want to help them through their problems and over the hurdles of mis-information.

2. Towards Learning -- really appreciate what new knowledge can mean in helping the individual grow; in building a better organization; and in solving problems. Perhaps we should underscore the importance of thinking as a part of learning. The leader should be interested in encouraging thought.

3. Towards Himself -- to understand that you don't lose by getting others to learn, that you may have to back down on being "the authority" in order to get thoughtful participation. You may have to shift from being the specialist and authority to being an educator while leading a discussion. Just remember that both roles are extremely useful.

C. How Does the Leader Handle Himself -- the simple rules of friendliness, courtesy and attentiveness all apply. Few things are more helpful than really learning how to listen so you truly grasp what the other person is saying, or where members of the group are actually disagreeing.

D. Some Things for the Discussion Leader to Do:

1. Prepare the place where you are meeting; make sure that you have the lighting and venilation you need and enough comfortable seats. Arrange the group informally, but so that everyone gets a chance to take part and hear and see what's going on.

2. Prepare the group for the discussion method itself; for your own changed role to discussion leader; for the topic of that session or for a whole series of sessions.

3. Prepare any resource people you use -- Tell them what kind of people are in your group, what they should talk about, that you will have discussion, to limit speech-making to about twenty minutes, what role you will play.

III. Techniques Which Help the Discussion Method Work.

A. Clearly state the problem or topic for discussion.

B. Provide some information or orientation to the problem:

1. From the leader
2. From a resource.
3. From the group
4. From materials given to the group.

C. Make use of questions -- keep in mind that you are more interested in learning and thinking than getting "pat" answers.

1. A question can be asked of the whole group -- make it clear that you want an answer.

2. You can rephrase a question and ask it again if at first you get no response.

3. Suggest a specific application of the question (or point). For example: "Would it work ..."

4. Use a directed question:

a. To a person with special experience or knowledge.
b. To someone who looks as if he is "ready" to answer.
c. And with a great deal of care, to someone who has not been taking part -- perhaps very off-hand: "What do you think of it?"

5. Use written prepared questions -- have some questions to distribute to the group -- let them read, think about it, then discuss.

D. When a question is asked you.

1. Re-direct the question to either the whole group, the person who asked it, or some other person.

2. Or sometimes, of course, answer the question.

E. Sometimes favorable comment, on someone's participation or the whole group, is helpful.

F. From time to time summarize what has been said, agreed to, areas of disagreement.

G. State the still unanswered problems -- you might ask: "Have we discussed ..."

H. Keep the discussion on the topic -- but be free enough to move to a related topic if this is the best way to make use of the group's interest.

I. Introduce new information -- or ask for it.

J. Be aware of when to move to the next point.

K. Make sure that the leader is prepared.

L. Don't let one person monopolize -- apply the "rules of the game"; be tactful, but firm.

M. Remember you can frequently take time to wait for an answer -- not all pauses are awkward. Sometimes it means a group is thinking or trying to get a problem in focus.

N. Make all "speeches" short -- perhaps limit to 10 minutes.

O. Summarize each session.

P. Prepare the group for the next discussion.

WORKING WITH NEW MEMBERS

Today's new member is the future active member, steward, or local officer -- or just a card carrier, critic, and problem. Even in the all-union shop, there is a problem: workers must join the union but this fact does not guarantee understanding and participation. Sometimes special problems, such as a feeling of resentment, come from the fact that the worker must join the union.

New members must be made to feel that joining the union is important to them and to the union, that the union is interested in their welfare and that their welfare depends on their own activity in the union. Officers and older members must make it evident that they welcome the new members into the organization.

I. One Approach.

1. A welcoming letter sent to the worker's home -- such a letter could include a welcome, the fact that the union is responsible for the wages and conditions now in the shop, the information that the worker should bring his problems to the union, the name of the worker's steward, and the signature of the local president.

2. Have the steward take an interest in the new member -- introduce him to workers, find his interests, explain the grievance procedure, invite him to meetings and perhaps arrange to take him to one or two meetings. If there is no formal initiation ceremony, the steward can present the new member with his union card and a copy of the by-laws and contract with an explanation of what they are. This type of program could be spread over a period of time and it could be developed as standard procedure in the case of each new member.

II. A More Ambitious Program.

1. Follow the above suggestions with regard to the welcoming letter and supervision by the steward.

2. Give the new member a feeling of importance -- and of the importance of the fact of joining -- by a full-fledged initiation ceremony:

   -- have the steward or an older member pick up and deliver the new member to the meeting

   -- make sure the new member is made welcone, and not lost in the back row

   -- conduct a simple but meaningful swearing-in ceremony, with perhaps the presentation of the union card, contract, and by-laws

   -- perhaps have a short welcoming speech by a union officer or representative

   -- serve refreshments (this might bring out some older members too)

   -- such ceremonies could be held on a regular schedule, or as often as necessary, to avoid excessive conflict with the regular business of the local

3. Send union literature to the new member's home:

   -- leaflets and pamphlets discussing the work of the union and the labor movement (DUES and PROGRESS leaflets)

   -- include a covering letter with one or two pieces at a time, but several mailings at intervals are better than a lot of materials sent at one time

   -- this can be developed as a standard procedure with some effort to follow up to give the new member the impression that he is expected to read the material

4. Send individual invitations to meetings to the new members for the first three or four meetings.

5. Establish some form of "buddy system" according to which each new member is assigned to an older member who is responsible for his education in union affairs and in getting him to meetings.

6. Show union films at meetings where new members are initiated.

7. Run classes for new members at regular intervals or when there are enough new members to make a class worthwhile.

III. New Member Classes -- suggested outline for two-session class:

1st session: Introduction (welcome by local president, explanation of the sessions, stress value of questions and discussion, have each member introduce self);

The Union We Belong To: (the local -- who belongs, when and why organized, how it works, dues and how spent; the national union -- why have one, size, number of locals, how it works, history and accomplishments, main job ahead; how related to parent federation).

2nd session: How the Union Protects You In the Shop (steward system, grievance procedure);

Your Rights Under the Contract (wages, hours, transfers, senority, vacations, holidays, insurance, etc.);

The Union Outside the Shop (meetings, recreation and education program, political action, community service);

There's A Place For You (how the new member can fit into' the union program);

Conclusion (democratic nature of the union, need for participation).

Printed and mimeographed leaflets and summaries can be distributed as they fit in during both sessions. (DUES, PROGRESS, By-Laws, Contract, diagram of grievance procedure, etc.)

A union film could be shown and discussed at each session.

INTRODUCTION

I believe, and profoundly hope, that from this day forth the opponents of social progress can take comfort no longer, for not since the March on Washington has there been such broad sponsorship and enthusiastic support for any undertaking as has been mobilized on behalf of "The Freedom Budget for All Americans."

These forces have not come together to demand help for the Negro. Rather, we meet on a common ground of determination that in this, the richest and most productive society ever known to man, the scourge of poverty can and must be abolished—not in some distant future, not in this generation, but within the next ten years!

The tragedy is that the workings of our economy so often pit the white poor and the black poor against each other at the bottom of society. The tragedy is that groups only one generation removed from poverty themselves, haunted by the memory of scarcity and fearful of slipping back, step on the fingers of those struggling up the ladder.

And the tragedy is that not only the poor, the nearly poor, and the once poor, but all Americans, are the victims of our failure as a nation to distribute democratically the fruits of our abundance. For, directly or indirectly, not one of us is untouched by the steady spread of slums, the decay of our cities, the segregation and overcrowding of our public schools, the shocking deterioration of our hospitals, the violence and chaos in our streets, the idleness of able-bodied men deprived of work, and the anguished demoralization of our youth.

For better or worse, we are one nation and one people. We shall solve our problems together or together we shall enter a new era of social disorder and disintegration.

What we need is an overall plan of attack.

This is what the "Freedom Budget" is. It is not visionary or utopian. It is feasible. It is concrete. It is specific. It is quantitative. It talks dollars and cents. It sets goals and priorities. It tells how these can be achieved. And it places the responsibility for leadership with the Federal Government, which alone has the resources equal to the task.

The "Freedom Budget" is not a call for a handout. It is a challenge to the best traditions and possibilities of America. It is a call to those who have grown weary of slogans and gestures to rededicate themselves to the cause of social reconstruction. It is a plea to men of good will to give tangible substance to long-proclaimed ideals.

A. Philip Randolph Institute

FOREWORD

After many years of intense struggle in the courts, in legislative halls, and on the streets, we have achieved a number of important victories. We have come far in our quest for respect and dignity. But we have far to go.

The long journey ahead requires that we emphasize the needs of all America's poor, for there is no way merely to find work, or adequate housing, or quality-integrated schools for Negroes alone. We shall eliminate slums for Negroes when we destroy ghettos and build new cities for all. We shall eliminate unemployment for Negroes when we demand full and fair employment for all. We shall produce an educated and skilled Negro mass when we achieve a twentieth century educational system for all.

This human rights emphasis is an integral part of the Freedom Budget and sets, I believe, a new and creative tone for the great challenge we yet face.

The Southern Christian Leadership Conference fully endorses the Freedom Budget and plans to expend great energy and time in working for its implementation.

It is not enough to project the Freedom Budget. We must dedicate ourselves to the legislative task to see that it is immediately and fully achieved. I pledge myself to this task and will urge all others to do likewise. The Freedom Budget is essential if the Negro people are to make further progress. It is essential if we are to maintain social peace. It is a political necessity. It is a moral commitment to the fundamental principles on which this nation was founded.

October 26, 1966 Martin Luther King

A "FREEDOM BUDGET" FOR ALL AMERICANS

The Freedom Budget is a practical, step-by-step plan for wiping out poverty in America during the next 10 years.

It will mean more money in your pocket. It will mean better schools for your children. It will mean better homes for you and your neighbors. It will mean clean air to breathe and comfortable cities to live in. It will mean adequate medical care when you are sick.

So where does the "Freedom" come in?

For the first time, everyone in America who is fit and able to work will have a job. For the first time, everyone who can't work, or shouldn't be working, will have an income adequate to live in comfort and dignity. And that is freedom. For freedom from want is the basic freedom from which all others flow.

This nation has learned that it must provide freedom for all if any of us is to be free. We have learned that half-measures are not enough. We know that continued unfair treatment of part of our people breeds misery and waste that are both morally indefensible and a threat to all who are better off.

As A. Philip Randolph put it: "Here in these United States, where there can be no economic or technical excuse for it, poverty is not only a private tragedy but, in a sense, a public crime. It is above all a challenge to our morality."

The Freedom Budget would make that challenge the lever we can grasp to wipe out poverty in a decade.

Pie in the sky?

Not on your life. Just simple recognition of the fact that we as a nation never had it so good. That we have the ability and the means to provide adequately for everyone. That simple justice requires us to see that everyone—white or black; in the city or on the farm; fisherman or mountaineer—may have his share in our national wealth.

The moral case for the Freedom Budget is compelling.

In a time of unparalleled prosperity, there are 34 million Americans living in poverty. Another 28 million live just on the edge, with income so low that any unexpected expense or loss of income could thrust them into poverty.

Almost one-third of our nation lives in poverty or want. They are not getting their just share of our national wealth.

Just as compelling, this massive lump of despair stands as a threat to our future prosperity. Poverty and want breed crime, disease and social unrest. We need the potential purchasing and productive power the poor would achieve, if we are to continue to grow and prosper.

In short, for good times to continue—and get better—we must embark immediately on a program that will fairly and indiscriminately provide a decent living for all Americans.

The Freedom Budget provides seven basic objectives, which taken together will achieve this great goal within 10 years. They are:

1. To provide full employment for all who are willing and able to work, including those who need education or training to make them willing and able.
2. To assure decent and adequate wages to all who work.
3. To assure a decent living standard to those who cannot or should not work.
4. To wipe out slum ghettos and provide decent homes for all Americans.
5. To provide decent medical care and adequate educational opportunities to all Americans, at a cost they can afford.
6. To purify our air and water and develop our transportation and natural resources on a scale suitable to our growing needs.
7. To unite sustained full employment with sustained full production and high economic growth.

WHAT WE HAVE TO WORK WITH Gross National Product in Billions of 1964 Dollars

The Freedom Budget shows how to do all this without a raise in taxes and without a single make-work job—by planning prudently NOW to use the economic growth of the future, and with adequate attention to our international commitments.

The key is jobs.

We can all recognize that the major cause of poverty could be eliminated, if enough decently paying jobs were available for everyone willing and able to work. And we can also recognize that, with enough jobs for all, a basic cause of discrimination among job-seekers would automatically disappear.

What we must also recognize is that we now have the means of achieving complete employment—at no increased cost, with no radical change in our economic system, and at no cost to our present national goals—if we are willing to commit ourselves totally to this achievement.

That is what the Freedom Budget is all about.

It asks that we unite in insisting that the nation plan now to use part of its expected economic growth to eliminate poverty.

Where will the jobs come from? What will we use for money?

If all our nation's wealth were divided equally among all us Americans, each share would be worth roughly $3,500. Of this, we grant to the Federal government a slice equal to roughly $500 in the form of taxes, leaving us an average of about $3,000 to spend on our other needs.

If our nation's productivity continues growing at the same rate as in recent years—and it will if the Freedom Budget is adopted—each share will grow to about $5,000. Thus, the Federal government's slice will grow to $700, with the present Federal tax structure, and we will still have $4,300 left for our other needs.

What the Freedom Budget proposes is this: Budget a fraction of the $200 increase in Federal tax revenues to provide jobs for all who can work and adequate income of other types for those who cannot.

No doles. No skimping on national defense. No tampering with private supply and demand.

Just an enlightened self-interest, using what we have in the best possible way.

By giving the poor a chance to become dignified wage earners, we will be generating the money to finance the improvements we all need—rich and poor alike. And we would be doing it by making new jobs with new money, so that no one who is now earning his own living would suffer.

The Freedom Budget recognizes that the Federal government must take the lead in attaining the eradication of poverty.

The Federal government alone represents all 200 million American individuals. It alone has the resources for a comprehensive job. And it has the responsibility for fulfilling the needs which are the basis for the Freedom Budget plan.

First, here's where the jobs would be coming from:

—Right now, the nation should begin budgeting to replace the 9.3 million "seriously deficient" housing units that make living in them a misery and form slums that are a blight upon our land.

The housing program contained in the Freedom Budget would have practically all Americans decently housed by 1975—while providing a wide range of jobs for the unemployed in housing construction and urban redevelopment.

—Critical shortages of water and power persist in many highly populated areas. Air and waters remain polluted. Recreation facilities are unavailable for those who need them most.

The Freedom Budget proposes the creation of millions of jobs in a program that will correct these pressing problems.

—We need, at a conservative estimate, 100,000 new public classrooms a year for the next six years, as well as considerable expansion of our institutions of higher learning.

Only the Federal government can meet the largest share of these needs, as well as providing for the hundreds of thousands of new teachers who also will be needed.

—We must double our rate of hospital construction if we are to keep up with our minimum requirements in this field, and we must expand rehabilitation and outpatient facilities.

As these and other programs swell the number of productive workers, cut down unemployment and increase consumption, the private sector of our national economy will inevitably grow also.

The Freedom Budget recognizes that full employment by itself is not enough to eradicate poverty. Therefore, it also proposes — and budgets for — a $2-an-hour Federal minimum wage covering everyone within Federal jurisdiction; a new farm program to provide adequate income to the 43 per cent of farm families who now live in poverty; and immediate improvements in Social Security, welfare, unemployment compensation, workmen's compensation and other programs designed to support those who cannot or should not work.

Where will the money come from?

The Freedom Budget recognizes that we cannot spend what we do not produce. It also recognizes that we must spend wisely what we do produce.

It proposes that a portion of our future growth—one thirteenth of what can reasonably be expected to be available —be earmarked for the eradication of poverty. The Freedom Budget proposed outlay of $185 billion in 10 years sounds like a great deal of money, and it is a great deal of money.

But it will come from the expansion of our economy that will in part be the result of wise use of that very $185 billion. It will build homes and schools, provide recreation areas and hospitals. It will train teachers and nurses.

It will provide adequate incomes to millions who now do not have them. And those millions will in turn buy goods they cannot now buy.

So the wage earner of today will benefit as well. His earnings will go up and his enjoyment of life will be increased. The opportunities for private enterprise will increase.

The breeding grounds of crime and discontent will be diminished in the same way that draining a swamp cuts down

WHAT THE FREEDOM BUDGET MEANS FOR FAMILY INCOMES
Number of Families (millions)

the breeding of mosquitoes, and the causes of discrimination will be considerably reduced.

But the Freedom Budget cannot become reality without a national effort. It requires a concentrated commitment by all the people of America, expressed in concrete goals and programs of the Federal Government. These goals and programs must encourage to the utmost the efforts of state and local governments and private enterprise.

It is not lack of good-will that has prevented the achievement of these great goals in the past. All of us, 200 million strong, are united in our willingness to share the abundance of America in equal impartiality with our fellows, and to grant equal opportunities to all.

What we must do—and what the Freedom Budget provides—is to express that will in the most direct, quickest and fairest way.

The Freedom Budget, then, is a new call to arms for a final assault on injustice. It is a rallying cry we cannot fail to heed.

THE "FREEDOM BUDGET": QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

1. Aren't We Making Progress in Eliminating Poverty Through the Kind of Sharp Economic Growth We've Had in the Past Two Years? What New Dimensions Does the "Freedom Budget" Add?

There is no evidence that the economic growth of the last two years has significantly dented poverty. Economic growth is a precondition for abolishing poverty, but it is not sufficient by itself. To it must be added programs that reach toward a more equitable distribution of our abundance. This is the dimension added by the "Freedom Budget."

2. Will Programs to Help the Poor Really Enable Them to Break the Cycle of Poverty?

Of course. The overwhelming majority of the poor don't want to be poor. They have been kept in poverty, in some cases for two or more generations. They are the victims of technological changes, of wrong-headed economic policies, of political powerlessness, of discrimination, of the environment of poverty itself. Their despair and demoralization can be dispelled only by the opening of genuine economic opportunity. When such opportunity is provided, along the lines suggested in the "Freedom Budget," the cycle of poverty can and will be broken.

3. How Many of the People in Poverty Are Capable of Handling Jobs and How Many Would Take Jobs if They Were Offered?

First of all, 20% of those in poverty are in families whose breadwinners already work full-time but at wages below the poverty level. Another 40% are victims of unemployment or underemployment; their problem is not unwillingness to work but the absence of jobs. Thus, fully 60% of the poverty problem could be eliminated if we achieved full employment at decent wages.

The remaining 40% of those in poverty either cannot or should not be working. Included are the physically disabled, the elderly, women with young children, etc. For them the "Freedom Budget" demands improved public assistance, social security and other payments, culminating in a guaranteed annual income.

Our past experience shows that federal programs such as the progressive income tax, social security, protection of collective bargaining and others have raised the income level of millions of people.

4. Won't the Spending of So Much Money Mean the Creation of More Government Agencies and Just Expand Bureaucracy?

The expansion of bureaucracy results from the effort to solve problems in a haphazard, piecemeal way. A coordinated national plan, such as the "Freedom Budget" does not call for new agencies; it calls for new levels of economic performance. People who are fully employed at decent wages do not need bureaucracies; the poor and disadvantaged do.

5. Will Taxes Have to be Raised to Provide the Money to Implement the Freedom Budget Programs?

Our current tax structure is very responsive to economic growth. If total output expands—and it will if Freedom Budget proposals are enacted—revenues to the federal government will rise by $10 billion each year. For the ten years, the cumulative effect will be to add in excess of $400 billion to our present tax revenue.

6. Where Will All the Money Come From?

From what the "Freedom Budget" calls the "economic growth dividend." If we put all of our resources to work, the country's total production will jump from $663 billion in 1965 to roughly $1.2 trillion in 1975. To reach this figure, the gross national product would rise each year by an average of $244 billion. Thus, over a ten-year period, the aggregate increase in the gross national product would be $2.4 trillion higher than if the economy remained at its present level. (See graph, p. 10) This is what is meant by "economic growth dividend." At present tax rates, such a dividend would result in an additional $400 billion or more in Federal revenues over the next decade. It is from these additional revenues that the "Freedom Budget" proposes the allocation of $185 billion to meet our critical social needs.

7. Aren't We Asking the American Public to Devote a Tremendous Amount of Money to Help Just a Small Group Within Our Society?

While it is true that poverty afflicts only a minority of Americans, it reflects a malfunctioning of our national economy which affects all Americans. The persistence of unemployment and underuse of resources detract from our total wealth. Had there been maximum employment and production between 1953-65, as would have been achieved under programs such as those proposed in the Freedom Budget, our gross national product would have been $550 billion higher, total private consumption would have been $364 billion higher, and public revenues would have been $135 billion higher. All Americans would have shared in this greater abundance.

Thus, we have all been deprived of the contribution the poor can make, as producers and consumers, to our economy. Moreover, nobody is untouched by the spread of slums, the decay of social services, and the human waste that lead to violence, crime and chaos. Every American suffers from outmoded urban transit, air and water pollution, inadequate schools and hospitals.

This is a "Freedom Budget" for all Americans.

8. Would Not a $2.00 Minimum Wage, Particularly in Agriculture, Reduce the Number of Jobs?

This is a standard argument against higher minimum wages, but it has no basis in fact. There was no increase in unemployment when minimum wages were raised in 1961 and again in 1963. On the contrary, because a $2.00 minimum wage would boost consumer purchasing power, total employment would probably rise.

Government programs should be established to help small enterprises achieve greater efficiency and to tide them over while they are adjusting to payment of a living wage.

9. Won't $185 Billion More in Spending Create Such High Demand for Goods and Services That Sharp Inflation Will Be Inevitable?

There is no evidence of serious shortages in goods at present. Should such shortages develop, however, or if tendencies toward inflation threaten, the "Freedom Budget" contends that the Federal Government has sufficient fiscal and monetary tools to deal with the problem, without scuttling our commitment to abolish poverty.

10. Does the "Freedom Budget" Assume That National Defense Expenditures Would Not Rise?

No. For national defense, space technology and all international outlays, the federal budget in 1967 was $64.6 billion. The "Freedom Budget" assumes this figure would rise to $87.5 billion in 1975.

In making this estimate, the Freedom Budget neither endorses nor condemns present military spending policies. It relies on the judgment of informed experts. Obviously, if the international situation improves and a reduction in military spending is in order, so much more money will be available for social needs. But even if military spending increases faster than now envisioned, the Freedom Budget proves that we can afford to carry out the necessary programs. But the abolition of poverty is too precious a goal to be made contingent on such a reduction.

SIGNATORIES OF "FREEDOM BUDGET"*

The "Freedom Budget" embodies a fundamental approach to the elimination of poverty for all Americans, regardless of color, and has other essential purposes. While not necessarily endorsing every detail, I am in broad agreement with its basic objectives and broad outlines.

TO: All Local Unions in Phillips, Lee, Monroe and St. Francis Counties

SUBJECT: Special Educational Institute
"Eastern Arkansas: Its Unions, People, and Problems"

Dear Sir and Brother:

In cooperation with the Southern Regional Council, we are planning to hold an Educational Institute this coming April 21st and 22nd at the Holiday Inn in Forrest City, Arkansas. The program will begin Friday evening at 7:00 p.m. and run through Saturday.

All local union officers, Executive Board members, Stewards and other leadership in your local union are invited.

This program is designed to bring local union leaders important information about the problems and possibilities in a changing South and in a developing Eastern Arkansas. The state's tax needs and tax problems will be discussed -- especially as they relate to working men and women. Also important issues concerning consumer protection, including such matters as credit and garnishment, will be considered.

This institute will help bring new insight to problems facing Arkansas and suggest constructive ways that unions and other groups can work cooperatively for better life for all of our people.

Outstanding experts and labor educators will be on hand to work with us on this fine program. Your union should make plans now to have a good delegation attend these sessions.

We will be looking forward to seeing you then.

Always with a good wish, I remain

Fraternally yours,

Bill Becker

At long last I am getting a confirming letter to you regarding the program we discussed for Eastern Arkansas. A copy of the announcement from the State AFL-CIO is enclosed.

Your participation will come on Saturday morning, April 22. We would be happy for you to be on hand for the evening of the 21st and for you to stay until the end of the day on Saturday, but this is not required.

We want you to discuss consumer problems. More specifically we want a discussion of those problems that relate to state legislation. This would include the complex of subjects revolving around interest rates, usury, credit, and garnishment. Also if there is legislation on weights and standards and "sharp" practices in general this would be helpful.

Could you state what the laws provide succinctly and then discuss the problem of needed legislation, administrative procedures, and the relation of the courts to consumer problems? We are not asking you tp push specific reforms or legislation, but an indication of the gaps, or existing problems which legislation or changed practices would cure would be most helpful.

You may find that a good approach is to use a few case examples as illustrations. I realize that all of this sounds like a big order for an hour and a half, but we are mainly trying to provide a meaningful orientation so that the union leaders can grasp the importance of this area to them and others. We do hope for discussion as a means to determine whether or not we are making effective contact with the group.

In general, we try not to underestimate the intelligence of our groups or overestimate their actual knowledge. I think you should count on the educational level as being a little less than high school graduate.

Don't hestitate to call me collect if you have any questions. We very much look forward to having you with us for this program.

Sincerely,

Emory F. Via, Director

Dear Ben:

I want to thank you on behalf of the Labor Program and the Arkansas State AFL-CIO for both your participation in the Institute at Forrest City and your assistance in working out the arrangements with some of the local Negro leaders. You played an important role in the undertaking.

I hope that by some happy accident that either you or Mr. Hamilton picked up my Institute notedbook. After the final panel session I could not find it anywhere. It does have some notes which I took on the Institute itself and copies of the correspondence between you and me and with the local Negro leaders. If you do not have it could you determine if Mr. Hamilton has it? Although I loose a number of things usually nothing of that sort. I would be most grateful to have it returned. I just hope that in the last minute shuffle to pick things from the table that it was in fact one of you who got my note book.

We are tentatively thinking of either July 7-8 or July 14-15 as the dates for a second institute to be held in Jonesboro. Could you tell me if you would be available for either or both of these dates? You might want to start thinking about local leaders who could be involved in this one too.

Please give my good regards to Howard Himlebaum. I am glad to know of his interest in the labor field.and pleased that he was able to be with us.

Best personal wishes.

Dear Dan:

First let me thank you for your participation in the Forrest City Institute. Your assistance in planning, instructing, and in seeing the institute through in general was most welcomed.

Could you shortly check your calendar to see if you could keep both July 7-8 and July 14-15 open for a possible institue at Jonesboro? I would like to keep both dates open until we can be sure which one will be the easier to staff.

As to Sunday, I am personally most appreciative for the opportunity to have had such a fine day with you. It was good fun and I trust we will get a chance for another trip. It is true that I have more bites from the mosquitoes than the two of us together got from the fish.

Thanks,too, for getting me to the airport in good style and on time.

This is just a note to express my appreciation for your cooperation in our recent joint educational institute in Forrest City. On balance, I think it went quite well.

Will you check your calendar to see if either or both July 7-8 or July 14-15 are convenient dates for an institute in Jonesboro? Is this still what you would like to do. If so, we can certainly find the time to put our heads together for a more detailed planning session.

Eventually, Dan and I decided it was dry enough to fish, cancelled my early plane and headed for the alake. We showed great restraint in not knocking on your door. Dan caught what he described as a six ounce bass - twice as big as yours.

The Financial Crisis Of State and Local Governments

At the very time that federal tax cuts—recent and anticipated—enjoy great popularity, 50 state governments and 90,000 local ones are grappling with the critical problem of how to raise more money to meet urgent public needs. In fact, this crisis has been plaguing state and local governments during all the postwar period and no respite can be expected in the years immediately ahead.

It is true that the current business boom—due in large part to the stimulus of the federal tax cut—is raising the revenue yield from state taxes already on the books. Nonetheless, as the Wall Street Journal has pointed out, most states view this good fortune to be "a momentary thing and expect rising costs and citizen demands for more and more services to land them back in the financial soup."

It also is true that the flow of federal grants-in-aid to help the states and localities finance urgent public services—public assistance, urban renewal, highways, health facilities, education and the like—has been increasing rapidly. However, this welcome aid from Washington is still too little to narrow the gap between the revenue available to the states and localities and the skyrocketing cost of the public facilities and services their citizens need and demand.

Over the last quarter century, the sums collected and spent at the federal level naturally have focused public attention on Washington. The increasingly urgent state and local revenue problems, on the other hand, have been pretty much obscured.

In 1963, the latest fiscal year for which census figures for all governments—federal, state and local—are available, the general federal expenditures reached $100 billion. This federal outlay was the highest for any peacetime year and it excludes disbursements by the Social Security and other insurance trusts.

Labor's ECONOMIC REVIEW

Prepared by Department of Research
Reprinted from October 1965
AFL-CIO AMERICAN FEDERATIONIST

It should be noted that, out of this total, the lion's share—about $72 billion—was spent to meet national defense and related costs, including veterans' benefits and interest on the largely war-incurred national debt.

When it comes to providing for the civilian public services the American people need, it is the states and localities—not Washington—that shoulder most of the load. In 1963, these governments by themselves raised and spent $56.5 billion for this purpose, compared to the $28.5 billion for civilian needs spent by the federal government.

Actually, of the $85 billion total spent in 1963 by government at all levels purely for civilian purposes, the states and localities themselves raised two-thirds.

What the states and localities have been managing to do, despite great and growing odds, is an impressive achievement:

- In the ten years alone from 1953 to 1963, annual state-local outlays to meet general needs soared from $28 billion to $65 billion. This 132 percent expenditure rise—half of which went for education, health and highways—reflects what actually was spent, not what might have been spent if money had been available to provide services consistent with need.

In 1965, state-local expenditures are expected to reach $75 billion.

Reflecting this rise, state-local payrolls increased from 4.5 million employes in 1953 to 7 million by 1963; they are expected to approximate 8 million this year. By way of contrast, the number of federal employes—about 2.5 million in 1965—has risen by only 200,000 since 1953. On the basis of employment growth, state and local government is the fastest growing "industry" in the United States.

- Most of the $37 billion state-local expenditure rise from 1953 to 1963 was financed by these governments themselves from increased general taxes and charges. These collections rose by $30 billion, from $24 billion in 1953 to $54 billion in 1963—a 125 percent rise. Moreover, most of this money came from regressive taxes imposed on property owners and consumers, the kind of levies that bear most heavily on those least able to pay.
- Federal grants-in-aid to states and localities rose 200 percent, from $2.9 billion in 1953 to $8.5 billion in 1963. Yet even this much-needed increase in revenue-sharing by Washington wasn't enough to close the state-local revenue gap.

• To meet their mounting needs, the states and localities had to borrow again in 1963, as they have during every postwar year. State-local debt stood at $34 billion in 1953; it reached $87 billion by 1963, a rise of almost 160 percent. This is a far more rapid increase than the rise in the federal debt.

By the end of 1965, state-local debt outstanding is expected to exceed $100 billion.

• By 1970, state-local expenditures may well reach $105-110 billion, according to competent observers. This would be a near-300 percent rise from the $28 billion outlay of 1953. By 1975, when it is predicted the population may well reach 225 million, some forecasters predict that state-local outlays will approach $150 billion. These expenditure forecasts, it should be noted, are not based on what should be spent but on likely outlays on the basis of existing trends.

• Although the number of dollars spent at the state and local level has risen so spectacularly, it is important to note that state-local tax levies in proportion to the value of all goods and services produced in the United States (the Gross National Product) went up only from 5.8 percent in 1953 to an anticipated 8 percent in 1965, a rise of barely 40 percent. Federal taxes as a percent of GNP, on the other hand, actually will have gone down about 18 percent between 1953 and 1965.

Why Expenditures Rise

The growth of state-local expenditures reflects no "wild spending spree." Almost everywhere, civilian public service needs far outpace the financial ability of the states and localities—and particularly the metropolitan areas—to cope with them. Part of the urgency grows out of the explosive postwar population rise. In large measure, it reflects spectacular changes in the places and the way Americans now live.

Back in 1940, before World War II, this was a nation of 132 million. Today there are 195 million Americans and, by 1970, there will be over 210 million. This astronomical population rise alone—an expansion approximating 3 million persons each year—has confronted the states and localities with a staggering increase in public service demands. Moreover, the public facility construction lag during World War II and the Korean War further intensified the problem.

What is more, the age groups that require the costliest government services—the old and the young—have expanded much faster than the rest of the population. While between 1953 and 1963 the total population increased 19 percent, persons over 65 increased 35 percent and the school-age population went up 40 percent.

It is no wonder that, from 1953 to 1963, total annual government outlays for public education—elementary, secondary and higher—soared from $10 billion to nearly $25 billion.

Most of this financial burden is still shouldered by local governments. Furthermore, if the quantity and quality of public education is to improve sufficiently to meet the need over the next five years—at the end of which nearly 5 million more young people will be enrolled in public schools—another tremendous increase in educational outlays will be required. In the 1969-70 school year, some $43 billion should be spent on public education alone, according to AFL-CIO Department of Education projections based on U.S. Office of Education findings.

The recent passage of the Education Act of 1965—which provides federal grants for elementary and high schools, with emphasis on the special needs of low-income school districts—will help to meet a part of the revenue gap. However, a far more substantial increase in aid will be required if the public school systems are to meet present revenue needs and the mounting requirements of the years ahead.

Clearly, then, to merely expand civilian public services in direct proportion to the population rise just isn't enough. Because of the far more rapid rise in the numbers of the young and the old, educational and social welfare services have had to increase faster than the average population rise.

But the general population increase, the shift in age distribution and the increase in government construction, equipment and salary costs are not the only reasons why total state-local outlays have risen so dramatically. Rapid changes in where Americans now live—and in the way they live—have compounded the expenditure problem.

The United States has gone through two great shifts in its living patterns. In the last quarter of the 19th century and the first quarter of the 20th, it evolved from a basically rural nation to a basically urban society. Inevitably, the growth of the cities rapidly increased the burden of traditional local public facilities and added new ones—for education, police and fire protection, sanitation, health and recreation and the like.

With the second great change in American life—the shift from an urban to a basically metropolitan society—the demand for expanded local services has become overwhelming.

The Metropolitan Area Crisis

According to the latest census, by 1960 two-thirds of all Americans—113 million in all—were crowded into 212 metropolitan areas occupying less than 9 percent of the entire surface of the United States.

Furthermore, this concentration of human beings is accelerating as more and more rural, and often destitute, Americans—displaced by the technical revolution in agriculture—seek better opportunities in town. Indeed, all of the nation's population growth is occurring in the metropolitan areas. While in 1955 less than 60 percent of our citizens lived in these areas, the total now has reached about 70 percent. Life in a metropolitan area—a central city with its suburbs and satellite towns, all compacted together in one vast interdependent community—multiplies the cost of traditional local public services and adds a growing list of new ones as its boundary becomes extended year by year.

For example, the crisis of transportation—of moving goods and people into and out of the core city—must be met. The never-ending task of finding enough revenue to meet educational and recreational needs, provide adequate water for human and industrial consumption, cope with air pollution, combat delinquency and crime, clear slums and assure decent housing and neighborhoods besets every metropolitan area.

The public as well as private financial outlays needed to secure proper housing alone are enormous.

According to the 1960 census, almost 16 million dwelling units—most of them in the metropolitan areas—are substandard; they are either dilapidated or badly deteriorating or lack running water or other basic plumbing facilities. Between 1960 and 1975, it is anticipated that another 6 million dwelling units will have become badly deteriorated and another 5 million will be lost as a result of fire, floods and public construction. Adding the housing needs of the 14 million additional families that the government estimates we will have by 1975—and subtracting the 7.5 million housing units started between 1960 and 1964 and about 5 million deteriorating homes that probably can be rehabilitated—the nation needs about 29 million new dwelling units by 1975.

This need could be met over the next ten years, but to do it home construction would have to be nearly doubled over the recent rate. Moreover, if low-income families, and many moderate-income ones as well, are to be decently housed, greatly expanded government financial aid will be required. The Federal Housing Act of 1965 will go part of the way to meet this need, but much more aid in the form of grants and guaranteed loans will be necessary. What is more, in addition to home building costs, billions of dollars of public investment in supporting services—sewage systems, water lines, streets, fire protection and the like—is required every year.

Aiding the impoverished, as central cities become the home of increasingly larger numbers of the aged, the poor and of minority groups, has alone become a staggering financial problem. It is no wonder that expenditures for public services associated with metropolitan living now run 2½ times more per capita than in localities outside these areas.

There are two major metropolitan area issues which are basic to solving these problems.

One of these is how to coordinate efficiently the public service efforts of the 18,000 separate but interdependent local governments—counties, municipalities, townships and school and special districts—that now exist within the 212 metropolitan areas. Back in 1960, the boundaries of over 100 of these areas already extended over two, three or even four counties; many, in fact, are now merging into each other. In 32 metropolitan areas, the intergovernmental coordinating effort will require cooperation across state lines; their boundaries are now interstate.

The second major issue, of course, is how to raise enough revenue to meet ever-growing local needs.

Many years ago, when America was dominantly rural, the public service requirements of most Americans were few—essentially schooling, the maintenance of law and order and road building—and local governments provided for them. Although civilian service needs have gradually multiplied, by 1913 the localities still were paying for as much as 75 percent of them. State governments accounted for only 16 percent of the cost. Most of the expenditures of the federal government—then as now—were related to its constitutional responsibility to "provide for the common defense."

By 1963, local tax collections totalled $22.2 billion and the local property tax accounted for $19.4 billion of that total. It has been, and it still remains, the almost exclusive tax resource of the localities. In 1963, the property tax provided 73 percent of the total tax revenue of the cities and 88 percent of the tax total of all local governments combined.

When America was primarily a nation of farmers, the ownership of land substantially reflected an individual's wealth and income and a property tax was a reasonably equitable way to share the tax load. Besides, it yielded enough revenue to meet the limited local needs of an earlier day.

As the country became industrialized and urbanized, however, personal and business income became more and more divorced from ownership of land and buildings, so that today property no longer accurately reflects "ability to pay." The property tax burden is most unfair to low- and moderate-income home-owners and, particularly, the aged. Moreover, its yield now is totally inadequate in relation to current local revenue needs.

As local revenue requirements became more acute —particularly those of the central cities at the heart of the metropolitan areas—the states began to sanction supplemental types of local levies, generally in the form of local sales and payroll taxes. These two taxes have the special attraction of collecting substantial sums from suburbanites who work, and may shop, in the central cities. These commuters are thereby charged for some of the city services they use. Even so, sales and payroll taxes have two decided disadvantages.

First of all, they are exceedingly regressive; proportionately, they bear most heavily on families whose incomes are the lowest.

The flat-rate sales tax extracts its yield from the first dollar spent, even by the very poorest; in many cases, even purchases of food and clothing are taxed.

The similarly flat-rate payroll tax generally allows no personal exemption to meet basic family needs; but it usually exempts non-wage and non-salary income entirely—the kind mostly enjoyed by families with the greatest ability to pay.

In addition, local sales and payroll taxes create group conflicts and economic dislocations—among local residents and commuters who pay taxes elsewhere and merchants in adjoining and competing taxing districts.

Already six states (Alabama, Kentucky, Michigan, Missouri, Ohio and Pennsylvania) sanction the use of local payroll taxes and ten of the 43 largest American cities now levy them. In addition, 17 states have already sanctioned local sales tax use. Although considerable revenue is often raised by these levies—and pressures for higher property taxes may be temporarily forestalled—they not only make the local tax structure even more regressive and create dissension between adjoining political jurisdictions; they are inadequate to meet soaring large-city revenue needs.

The Burdens of the States

Depending on their own resources and inclinations, various states have tried in various ways to relieve the growing financial burden of their local subdivisions. Following the wave of local bankruptcies of the 1930s, almost all began relinquishing their own use of property taxes in an effort to help their local governments. They have taken over functions formerly performed and paid for by the localities, such as welfare services and road building and maintenance. Many now share state-collected funds with their local jurisdictions, particularly with hard-pressed school districts.

This assistance is financed in part by the federal grants-in-aid—most of which go directly to the states —and in part by revenue raised by the states themselves from taxes and charges of their own.

The amount of assistance the states can give, however, is limited by many factors.

The states, too, are under great pressure to increase their outlays for statewide public services as their populations grow and new needs emerge. Demands for more and better roads and highways, mental health services, recreational facilities and increased support for higher education mount year by year.

Between 1965 and 1970, for example, the total enrollment in public institutions of higher learning is expected to increase by 1.3 million—a five-year rise of over 40 percent. Accommodating this burgeoning growth, and accompanying public service demands, is primarily a state responsibility.

The ability of the 50 states to meet their direct burdens, and to help the localities meet theirs, varies widely. Because of great variation in wealth and incomes from state to state, their tax bases and public revenue potentials differ accordingly. As a consequence, public service expenditures usually are least adequate where the needs happen to be greatest.

In 1963, the five states with the lowest per capita income spent $262 per capita for all state-local services while the five wealthiest spent $417—and this despite the fact that the poorest received more federal aid per capita than the richest. In 1964, public school outlays per pupil ranged from $241 in Mississippi to $705 in New York. These figures refer to statewide averages; the expenditure range in localities within particular states—even the wealthy ones—is often more extreme.

A low level of state or local expenditures for public services doesn't by any means indicate that a poor effort is being made. On the contrary, the poorer states and localities are taxing their citizens far more rigorously on the whole—as measured by the ratio of state-local general revenues to personal income—than the wealthier ones.

The major revenue source of the states is the yield from taxes levied on consumers. In 1964, when state tax collections totaled $24 billion, nearly 60 percent came from general retail sales taxes and selective sales levies on the purchase of gasoline, cigarettes, alcoholic beverages and other items. Taxes on individual income raised only 14 percent of the total and corporate income taxes yielded only 7 percent. The remainder came from estate and gift taxes, motor vehicle and other license fees, severance taxes and the like.

From Wisconsin's adoption of the first individual income tax in 1911 and for many years thereafter, as one state after another put this kind of levy on its books, it seemed reasonable to assume that progressive taxes on income would become the revenue mainstay of the states. The income tax accorded with the concept of tax equity and it finally had been declared legal under the Constitution of the United States. A levy based on actual income, with deductions of expenses in securing it and with personal exemptions for dependents, and tax rates that graduated upward as incomes rose, clearly related the tax burden to ability to pay. Moreover, a new broad-based revenue source was needed by the states as taxes on property gradually were being relinquished.

In the early 1930s, however, resort to general retail sales taxes quickly spread. The bankruptcy of many local governments and their urgent need for help, as well as the depression-induced decline in individual and business income, triggered this movement. In most states, the sales tax rate initially was only 1 or 2 percent. Often it was enacted to meet a specific and dramatic emergency like paying the salaries of school teachers; almost always it was intended as a temporary levy.

Since the mid-1930s, in fact, sales taxes—general and selective—have been bringing in more than half of the total tax revenues of the states. As for the individual income tax, not a single new state enacted one between 1937 and 1960. There are several reasons. Use of a progressive income tax was declared to be in violation of the constitutions of several states. Opponents often argued successfully that levies on income and profits would drive business from their states. The increased federal income tax burden during and following World War II was also cited as sufficient reason not to support its further use by the states. Perhaps most effective, it was relatively easy to raise more revenue merely by raising existing sales tax rates.

In the frenzied postwar effort to find new state revenue sources, taxes on consumers again have received the greatest play. In 1947, 23 state revenue systems included a general retail sales tax. By July 1, 1965, 16 more states had adopted it and 19 of the original sales-tax states had raised their rates, some two or three times. In eight states, the rate had already gone up over 3 percent. In 28 of the 39 general sales tax states, the levy applies even to food.

By way of contrast, at the beginning of the postwar period 30 states taxed personal incomes, but by 1965 only three more had been added to the list. What is more, although a few states have been raising a third or more of their tax revenue from the individual income tax—notably Alaska, Delaware, New York, Oregon and Wisconsin—several wealthy ones like Connecticut, Illinois, Michigan, New Jersey and Pennsylvania levy no tax at all on individual income. In Ohio, Texas and Washington, no income tax is imposed on individuals or on corporations. Moreover, in many income-tax states the exemptions sometimes are so high or the rates are so low, little revenue is collected. Although some state income tax rates have risen, generally they have increased most at lower income levels and the degree of overall progressivity has declined.

The Major Dependence on Regressive Taxes

Because progressive individual and corporate income taxes play a minor overall role in state revenue systems—and none at all at the local governmental level—their contribution to the great rise in state-local tax collections from 1953 to 1963 was small. Of the $30 billion increase in state-local revenue collections from their own resources, $23 billion of the 1953-63 rise was obtained from higher tax yields. Of this total, 78 percent was provided by increased levies on property and consumers. Less than 13 percent came from progressive taxes on individual and corporate income, related in some degree to ability to pay.

In the effort of the states to help themselves and their localities meet soaring revenue needs, a fresh look at the too frequently neglected potential of state income taxes is in order. There are compelling reasons of economics, equity and even politics for doing so.

While every tax increase involves a risk for political leaders who support it, the time may well have come in many states when failure to meet pressing public needs is fully as hazardous as the risk in seeking more tax revenue with which to pay for them. What is more, there may now be no greater political jeopardy —and perhaps less—in supporting income taxes based on ability to pay than in supporting further levies on property, payrolls and consumers. This would be particularly true where the sales tax is already so high the time-worn claim that "it only costs a few pennies" has become a mockery. It is also true wherever property taxes already impose an insufferable burden on low-income families, the aged and small businesses.

According to a U. S. Treasury study, regressive state and local taxes are extracting $650 million yearly from the very poorest citizens—families with incomes of under $3,000 and individuals with less than $1,500—on whose behalf governments are supposed to be waging a war on want. Because of the burden of these regressive taxes on the neediest—and on millions of moderate- and lower-income families as well—a more favorable climate for the increased use of state income taxes seems to be emerging. The three new ones enacted since the end of World War II were all placed on the books during the course of the last four years.

Public officials increasingly are realizing, in addition, that as national production and income go up, the revenue yielded from income taxes shows the fastest growth. Since public service costs are mounting so rapidly, the tax with the greatest automatic revenue-growth potential has very much to recommend it.

Perhaps of most importance, a part of the burden of all income taxes levied by the states—on individuals and corporations alike—can be passed on to the federal government. This comes about because all those who itemize their deductions under the federal income tax law—upper-bracket individuals and corporations do so as a matter of course—are allowed to deduct their state income tax payments before computing what is due the federal government. Thus Washington stands ready to sacrifice a part of its own income-tax potential to help the states increase theirs. In effect, as the state tax goes up, the federal tax goes down. States with weak income-tax laws, or with none at all, are forfeiting the advantage to themselves of this indirect federal revenue-sharing device.

As far back as the 1920s, when competition to attract wealthy residents was undermining effective death and gift taxation by the states, the Congress did something constructive about it. It decided to grant a generous federal death tax "credit," of up to 80 percent of the federal levy, if an estate tax also had been adopted by the state. This federal credit had the effect of reducing or eliminating entirely the burden of the state tax, since the revenue gain to the state tended to become a federal loss rather than an added cost to the taxpayer.

As a consequence, all states except Nevada adopted estate or inheritance taxes and these, together with state gift taxes, are now raising over two-thirds of a billion dollars. The spur of the federal credit not only ended the shortsighted competition to attract wealthy residents; it also helped the states increase their revenue significantly. At the same time, it helped make state tax structures somewhat more equitable.

The Need for Wider Use of Income Taxes

To further advance the same ends, it now would be timely for the Congress to consider allowing a state income tax "credit," similar to the one allowed against the federal death tax, when comparable taxes are levied by the states. A federal income tax credit inevitably would encourage all states to seek considerable revenue from income taxes, yet without substantially increasing the burden on individuals and corporations. Furthermore, moderate- and lower-bracket taxpayers would directly benefit; they would be permitted to subtract the credit from their federal tax liability, whether they itemized or not.

There is a further special reason to urge greater federal revenue-sharing with the states at this time via an income-tax credit and by other means.

As the American economy grows, federal income-tax collections increase very rapidly and much of this rising yield can and should be shared with the states and localities. This can be done most effectively, as will be shown, by larger federal grants-in-aid. A state income-tax credit also could well serve as a constructive revenue-sharing supplement.

Because state and local revenue requirements are now so great, realism does not encourage the expectation that, as a whole, regressive taxes can be rolled back. Nonetheless, significant steps toward greater overall state-local tax equity can be achieved. In almost all states, a substantial part of the rising revenue need surely can be met through increased use of progressive income taxes—with or without a federal credit—and a large part of the yield should be shared with local governments. By this means, increases in property taxes and the extension of sales and payroll levies can be stayed. The end of the sales tax levy on food should receive the highest priority; much of the revenue loss can be recouped by extending this tax to services, now largely uncovered. The regressive local payroll tax, moreover, can be converted into a progressive local income tax; this can be done if the cities adopt a local income tax as a percentage of what their citizens pay under a graduated state income tax. And the states can well be the collecting agents.

The State and Local Share of the Cost of Civilian Public Services

While even the poorer states could increase their revenue collections through effective use of income taxes, the revenue potential of this route is, of course, limited for them. Yet these are the states where the revenue need is the greatest.

To aid all states, but particularly the poorest, federal tax sharing by expanding the traditional direct federal grant-in-aid also is imperative.

Since Civil War days—when the Congress decided to help every state establish a land-grant college—these federal aid programs have been undertaken to achieve two major ends.

First, they seek to encourage states and localities—through the stimulus of available federal matching funds—to initiate or expand public services which the Congress views to be vital to the national welfare.

Second, they seek especially to help the poorer states and hard-pressed local governments achieve minimum standards in the performance of important public services which could not otherwise be financed from their own resources alone.

Federal grants help to finance the construction of highways, hospitals and airports; assistance for the needy aged, orphans and the blind; vocational education and rehabilitation services for the handicapped; urban renewal and public housing; aid for chronically distressed areas; improved child welfare services; low-cost hot lunches in the schools and other programs.

Although the $8.5 billion in federal grants received by states and localities in 1963 was 200 percent higher than in 1953, the increase accounted for only 16 percent of the $35 billion rise in state and local general revenues over the ten-year period. Close to $30 billion —84 percent of the revenue rise—had to be raised by the states and localities themselves.

In 1965, total grants will exceed $11 billion, and in 1966 over $13 billion, as new federal aid programs like those for education, health services and Appalachia get under way.

This, indeed, is a trend in the right direction; yet much more can and should be done. The mounting revenue needs of the states and localities—and particularly of the poorer states and the metropolitan areas—require the massive assistance that only a more rapid expansion of federal grants can provide. Fortunately, as the growing national economy brings in more federal tax receipts, the means are at hand to divert substantially more revenue via federal grants to hard-pressed state and local governments.

The Role of Federal Grants-in-Aid

In the face of this long-emerging and evident need, two proposals already have been made to cut the federal grants-in-aid.

During the Eisenhower Administration, it was seriously proposed that several grant programs be terminated and the states themselves finance them through the adoption of certain excise taxes which the federal government would forego. Another alternative, sometimes still heard, is that Washington should reduce its grants-in-aid and instead return to each state a fixed portion of the federal taxes collected from them.

Both proposals have been conceived, purportedly, to safeguard "states' rights;" had they actually been enacted, however, a serious wrong would have been perpetrated.

In the first place, under these schemes the poorer states—those which now receive proportionately the largest share of the federal grants—would be the obvious victims. The wealthiest states—those which need aid least—would reap the benefit.

Secondly, it couldn't be taken for granted that even in the better-off states those services now federally aided would continue. The absence of the stimulus of federal matching funds would in all likelihood strengthen the reactionary bloc in all state legislatures which consistently fights adequate appropriations to meet public service needs.

Finally, these proposals would not add one dollar to the present overall, but inadequate, resources available to the states and localities.

Only a year ago, a new proposal to help close the state-local revenue gap is reported to have been made by a special presidential task force. While supporting continuation of the traditional system of federal grants, it is reported to have recommended that $2-3 billion or more from rising federal tax receipts be transferred each year to the states as a "block grant," with practically "no strings attached." The authors emphasize the critical nature of the state-local revenue need and the advantages of revenue-sharing via federally-collected progressive taxes as preferable to further state-local recourse to regressive taxes. The AFL-CIO Executive Council felt compelled, however, to oppose for other reasons "any indiscriminate rebate of federal taxes to the states with no restriction on the use of such funds."

This position was taken for the following reasons:

- While the time-tested federal grant programs help finance specific high priority public service needs, unconditional grants might be spent for any purpose—even to finance efforts to lure plants from other states.
- Since unrestricted grants would go into the general accounts of the states, for any purpose, the enforcement of federal standards which now apply to federally-supported expenditures—anti-discrimination and minimum labor standards, for example—could no longer be assured.
- The long-established federal grant procedure encourages the states and localities to increase their own revenue-raising efforts, but the receipt of unrestricted cash grants could well result in a relaxed effort on the part of some states.
- While the traditional federal grants are fashioned particularly to help poorer states and increasingly to aid local governments, the alternative block grants—like the two proposals already discussed—would go only to the states and proportionately too much would go to those states whose needs are least. The revenue-starved core cities of metropolitan areas—where the crisis is most acute—would be completely bypassed.
- Federal grants increasingly aid projects which cross state lines—to meet mutual water and transportation needs, for example. Block grants to the states hardly would stimulate the growth of this kind of essential interstate cooperation.
- Finally, any federal revenue allocated via block grants inevitably would retard the far more desirable growth of the traditional federal grants-in-aid.

Two major federal formulas for helping the states and localities have been particularly emphasized here: (1) an outright federal tax credit against income taxes paid to the states and (2) a substantial increase in federal grants-in-aid. But it also should be reiterated that state and local governments have a responsibility to show far more initiative in helping themselves, too.

With the prospect that the metropolitan area population will double by the year 2,000—only 35 years away—and that public service obligations of all local and state governments will continue to soar, state and local efforts to meet them must move on many fronts.

Wherever state income taxes are ineffectively utilized, or aren't levied at all, a change is overdue. Moreover, because of the greater ability of the states to levy and collect taxes, state revenue-sharing with the hard-pressed localities must be substantially increased. The unfair burden of regressive sales and payroll taxes can be reduced, at least. State aid should be given to help local governments improve the administration of their property taxes and make these levies more fair.

Other forms of state-local intergovernmental cooperation must be undertaken. The establishment of Metropolitan Area Planning Commissions—to study ways to improve services, eliminate duplication and waste and to plan orderly metropolitan area growth—should be encouraged by the states. The consolidation of political subdivisions—particularly the smaller school districts—should be spurred. Coordinated resource conservation and development programs that mutually affect and will serve many localities—to assure an adequate and unpolluted water supply, for example—must be supported by the states. Many other constructive ideas have been advanced. For example, the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations has proposed that each state establish a permanent Office of Local Affairs to continuously seek better forms of state-local cooperation.

The success of almost all of these undertakings depends essentially on leadership by the states. What too often has been lacking is not forward-looking ideas, but the will to implement them.

Hopefully, as state legislatures become reapportioned and cities and suburbs gain a louder voice, state responsibilities as well as states' rights may become increasingly a major legislative concern.

Just as the states cannot ignore the obligation to use their full powers to help their local subdivisions, the federal government, too, must use more of its great resources to aid the state and local governments. Increased federal revenue-sharing is not the only need. New forms of federally-initiated cooperation to help solve interstate problems—like the recently-enacted program to aid the 11-state Appalachian region—are increasingly important. Likewise, a greater cooperative effort to aid the metropolitan areas is a critical need; creation of the new federal Department of Housing and Urban Affairs points the way.

The rapid increase in these forms of intergovernmental action—between the states and their localities and between them and the federal government—will do more than help resolve financial and other specific problems. This kind of cooperation can be a major factor in strengthening the traditional American system of separate federal, state and local functions.

Main speakers for the four-day conference will include U. S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark, Mayor Richard Hatcher of Gary, Ind., Dr. Kenneth Clark of New York, State Rep. Julian Bond of Atlanta, and newly elected Congresswoman Shirley Chisholm of New York.

In addition to the general sessions, the black elected officials will attend a number of workshops and panel discussions arranged by the Voter Education Project to enable them to fill their offices more effectively. Between 200 and 300 of the 380 black elected officials in the South are expected to attend.

Rep. Bond will deliver the opening address at an 8 p.m. dinner Dec. 11. During last summer Rep. Bond gathered case histories for a soón-to-be-published VEP booklet on how black candidates in the South conduct their campaigns.

Attorney General Clark will speak at a banquet Dec. 13. John Wheeler of Durham, president of the Southern Regional Council, will preside and VEP Director Vernon E. Jordan Jr. will introduce the speaker.

Mayor Hatcher will speak at a public forum Dec. 12 at Clark College. Students from the Atlanta University complex and the public will be invited to attend and pose questions for Mayor Hatcher and a panel of four other black officeholders.

Richard Hatcher

Mayor Richard Hatcher of Gary, Indiana, will highlight The Southern Regional Council, for Southern Black Elected Officials in Atlanta, Georgia, December 11-14, 1968. Some 300 parsons from across the South are expected to attend.

Dr. Clark, noted New York psychologist and president of the Metropolitan Applied Research Center, will speak at a luncheon Dec. 12. Speaker that morning will be Dr. Samuel D. Cook of Duke University, chairman of the VEP advisory committee, who will trace the history of Negro political participation in the South.

Mrs. Chisholm, who won election Nov. 5 in New York's Bedford - Stuyvesant area, is the first Negro woman to be sent to Congress. She will address the conference's concluding luncheon Dec. 14.

With the exception of the Friday at Clark College and the Dec. 13 banquet at which Attorney General Clark will speak, all sessions will be held at the Dinkler Plaza Hotel, which will be conference headquarters. The Dec. 13 banquet will be held at the American Motor Hotel.

A luncheon panel Dec. 13 will feature five Negro candidates who recently mounted major campaigns in the South and lost. The five and the offices they sought are Maynard Jackson, U. S. Senate in Georgia; Reginald A. Hawkins, governor in North Carolina; Charles Evers, U. S. House in Mississippi; George A. Payton, U. S. House in South Carolina; and A. W. Willis, mayor in Memphis.

Three black experts on finance and taxation will appear on a panel on the morning of Dec. 13. They are Gerald Lamb, Connecticut state treasurer; Theodore Jones, Illinois director of revenue; and Alfred Pelham, chairman of Great Lakes Mutual Life Insurance Company, Detroit.

Appearing on the panel with Mayor Hatcher will be State Rep. Robert Clark of Holmes County, Miss.; City Councilman Henry Marsh of Richmond, Va.; State Rep. J. C. Daugherty of Atlanta; and John McCown, newly elected commissioner from Hancock County, Ga.

A panel discussion will follow Dr. Cook's Dec. 12 address. Members of the panel will be State Sen. Barbara Jordan of Houston, Texas; Lawrence T. Guyot Jr., chairman of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party; Dr. C. G. Gomillion, school board member from Tuskegee, Ala.; and Joseph A. Jordan Jr., city councilman from Norfolk, Va.

Atlanta Mayor Ivan Allen will greet the officeholders at the first morning session on Dec. 12.

The officials will divide into five groups for workshops on the afternoon of Dec. 12 and of Dec. 13, and the morning of Dec. 14.

Purpose of the four-day meeting, which is wholly sponsored by VEP, is to bring the elected officials together to discuss mutual problems, to share experiences, and to receive information designed to help them serve more effectively.

Only those officials holding elected public offices are being invited. The list includes 151 city officials, 78 law enforcement and judicial officials, 72 school board members, 55 county officials, and 26 state legislators, all from the 11 states of the Old South.

VEP has employed the Rev. John Morris, former executive director of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity, to handle planning and arrangements for the conference. VEP has held somewhat similar conferences for newly elected Negro officials in Mississippi and Louisiana during the past year.

The Voter Education Project, a program of the Southern Regional Council, Inc., supports projects of voter registration, citizenship education and leadership training in the 11 Southern states.

The Southern Regional Council is a non-profit nonpartisan organization of white and Negro Southerners formed in 1944 to advance "equal opportunity for all the South's people."

Dr. Samuel D. Cook of Duke University, chairman of the VEP advisory committee, will trace the history of Negro political participation in the South.

Mrs. Chisholm, who won election Nov. 5 in New York's Bedford-Stuyvesant area, is the first Negro woman to be sent to Congress. She will address the conference's concluding luncheon Saturday.

With the exception of the forum at Clark College and the Friday banquet at which Clark will speak, all sessions will be held at the Dinkler Plaza Hotel, which will be conference headquarters. The Friday banquet will be held at the American Motor Hotel.

A luncheon panel Friday will feature five Negro candidates who recently mounted major campaigns in the South and lost. The five and the offices they sought are Maynard Jackson, U. S. Senate in Georgia; Reginald A. Hawkins, governor in North Carolina; Charles Evers, U. S. House in Mississippi; George A. Payton, U. S. House in South Carolina; and A. W. Willis, mayor in Memphis.

Three black experts on finance and taxation will appear on a panel on Friday morning. They are Gerald Lamb Connecticut state treasurer; Theodore Jones, Illinois director of revenue; and Alfred Pelham, chairman of Great Lakes Mutual Life Insurance Company, Detroit.

Appearing on the panel with Mayor Hatcher will be State Rep. Robert Clark of Holmes County, Miss.; City Councilman Henry Marsh of Richmond, Va.; State Rep. J. C. Daugherty of Atlanta; and John McCown, newly elected commissioner from Hancock County, Ga.

A panel discussion will follow Dr. Cook's address. Members of the panel will be State Sen. Barbara Jordan of Houston; Lawrence T. Guyot Jr., chairman of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party; Dr. C. G. Gomillion, school board member from Tuskegee, Ala.; and Joseph A. Jordan Jr., city councilman from Norfolk.

Atlanta Mayor Ivan Allen will greet the officeholders at the Thursday morning session.

The officials will divide into five groups for workshops.

Purpose of the four-day meeting, which is wholly sponsored by VEP, is to bring the elected officials together to discuss mutual problems, to share experiences, and to receive information designed to help them serve more effectively.

Only those officials holding elected public offices are being invited. The list includes 151 city officials, 78 law enforcement and judicial officials, 72 school board members, 55 county officials, and 30 state legislators, all from the 11 states of the Old South.

Rev. John Morris, former executive director of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity, will handle planning and arrangements for the conference. VEP has held somewhat similar conferences for newly elected Negro officials in Mississippi and Louisiana during the past year.

The Voter Education Project, a program of the Southern Regional Council, Inc., supports projects of voter registration, citizenship education and leadership training in the 11 Southern states.

The Southern Regional Council is a non-profit nonpartisan organization of white and Negro Southerners formed in 1944 to advance "equal opportunity for all the South's people."

ELECTED NEGROES STUDY PROBLEMS

Louisiana Official Depicts Trouble With U.S. Agency

By WALTER RUGABER

ATLANTA, Dec. 14—Grand Coteau is a little town in south-central Louisiana with no sewers few paved streets and a rickety water system that breaks down every once in a while and leaves the pipes dry for two or three days.

Peter Smith, who was born in Grand Coteau 39 years ago, remembers some of the former Councilmen there as nice enough men. But, he explains earnestly, "they just met and paid the bills and went home."

Now Mr. Smith and two other negroes control the five-member governing body, and they have worked out a plan to improve conditions in Grand Coteau. But its implementation has proved frustrating.

Mr. Smith, who also serves as Mayor pro tem, spent four days in Atlanta this week with about 200 of the 385 Negroes who hold elected public offices in the 11 states of the former Confederacy.

The gathering, sponsored by the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council, was tangible evidence of Negro political advance in the region. But the difficulties, such as Mr. Smith's, are widespread.

Three years ago, after Mr. Smith's election to the Council, Grand Coteau hired a consulting engineer to draw plans for sewers, paved streets, a reliable water system and a natural gas network to permit town growth.

The engineering plan was sent to the Department of Housing and Urban Development with an aplication for 80 per cent Federal financing and 20 per cent local matching funds.

"I wouldn't know of anybody in Grand Coteau that would try to block that program," Mr. Smith said. "We're all for it. We all need it."

Grand Coteau could not get a clear response from the Federal agency, Mr. Smith said. There was talk of a shortage of funds for "small towns," he went on, but aparently the department found nothing wrong with the plan itself.

For three years, the councilmen said, letters have gone back and forth to Austin, Tex., where the regional offices are situated, and to Washington. Different bureaus and sections have been involved.

"It's like a man's house is on fire and you call the fire department and they say the fire truck is out on somebody else's house, and you call someone else and it goes on to somebody else and your house is burned down by then," Mr. Smith said.

Exchange of Letters

Mr. Smith insists that despite an exchange of 25 to 50 letters, he still does not know the cause of the delay. Experts at the conference here were unfamiliar with the case and unable to suggest a reason.

Recently, Mr. Smith said, the city of Lafayette, 12 miles away, received a $55,000 Federal grant to air-condition its bus system. This development, he remarked, was hard to explain to the people of Grand Coteau.

"It was fun to be making these plans and spending the extra time getting them ready and all," Mr. Smith said. "But now it's getting to the stage where, you know, it's getting discouraging when you get no results out of it."

Several organizations are moving to reduce the uncertainty that often confronts inexperienced new officeholders. Whites in some communities have denied advice or misled Negro officials.

The voter project said "service centers" for black leaders would go into operation next month at predominantly Negro colleges in Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana.

Negro Officeholders Meeting Is Scheduled

JACKSON DAILY NEWS

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP)—Negro officeholders from throughout the South are being invited to a conference here next week to discuss mutual problems.

Principal speakers for the Dec. 11-14 conference include U.S. Atty. Gen. Ramsey Clark and four top Negro officials.

Mayor Richard Hatcher of Gary, Ind.; Rep. - elect Shirley Chisolm of New York, first Negro woman elected to Congress; Georgia State Rep. Julian Bond, and Dr. Kenneth Clark of New York, a psychologist who heads the Metropolitan Applied Research Center, are among the Negro officeholders scheduled to address the conference.

Vernon E. Jordan Jr., director of the Voter Education Project the Southern Regional Council, said Tuesday in announcing the conference, "The idea is that we are dealing with an elected offi- legally, arbitrarily and syste- officeholders face antagonism matically excluded from the political processes."

Jordan contended that Negro and prejudice which often makes their task more difficult than similar posts are for white officials.

The project, which conducts voter registration and educational projects in 11 Southern states, expects 200 to 300 of the South's 380 Negro officeholders to attend the session.

According to the project's figures, there are 151 Negro city officials, 78 law enforcement and judicial officeholders, 72 school board members, 55 county officers, and 30 state legislators in the South.

The conference will also include discussions of finance and taxation by three Negro experts and a panel session with five Negroes who were defeated in their bids for major posts.

The Negro Politicians Assess Their Situation

By PAUL W. VALENTINE

ATLANTA — Lawrence T. Guyot Jr., a bullishly-energetic Mississippi man, pointed a finger at his fellow black politicians in the hotel meeting room.

"The political bitch that spawned southern politics," he warned, "is in heat again."

Guyot, a functionary of the Missi[illegible]ppi Fre[illegible]m Dem[illegible]

if-youthful Georgia legislator, warned them in a keynote speech that the incoming national administration is being formed by a man "against whom 90 per cent of you voted last November." President-elect Richard M. Nixon has no favors to repay the black man, he said.

New black officeholders to learn from veterans

By Robert P. Hey
Staff correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

Atlanta

Suppose politicians never let you take part in politics, even shooed you away when you tried to vote.

Then one day you could run for office, and you won. Would you know how to do your job, or even what it was—especially if colleagues hindered you, instead of helping?

Sounds improbable, doesn't it?

But it's precisely the situation several score black politicians in the South face today. Last month 107 black candidates won political office throughout the South. Some are politically sophisticated; most aren't.

It's to help this unschooled majority understand their jobs, and learn how best to do them, that a first-ever conference is being held later this month in Atlanta. It's called the first Southwide conference of black elected officials and is being held by the Voter Education Project of the privately financed Southern Regional Council.

In the past two years the Voter Education Project has held several smaller conferences to instruct newly elected black officials in the precise duties of their jobs. Most have been statewide conferences.

The fascinating aspect of this Southwide conference is that, for the first time, newly elected black officials will be learning from black officials who have already been on the job a year or two.

This is another benchmark in the political progress of the black Southerner. Heretofore there were next to no experienced black officials—nobody able to help neophytes with the many problems black officials face that white one's don't. Today there are quite a few.

The Voter Education Project figures there are about 385 black elected officials in the 11 Southern states now. (In November, 1965, there were only 70.) Between 220 and 250 are expected at this conference.

Much of the "meat" of the four-day affair Dec. 11-14 will be in the workshops. They'll be divided by general job category —school-board members in one hall, city officials in another, and so forth.

No one will make speeches in the workshops. After the sessions are called to order, the new officeholders will quiz veterans. (How did you tackle this problem, and that one?) At each session there'll also be a special resource person.

Not all answers known

Surely new officials will bring up the many problems unique to black officials, such as: How do you stop white school-board members from conducting their real business in a private session at a club (without inviting you, naturally), then holding only a pro forma legal meeting? How can a black justice of the peace get white legal officials to cooperate, instead of ignore him?

For the first time, this year newly elected black officials will get answers from experienced black officials, men who have faced the same problems. If they haven't solved them, at least they have thoughts on dealing with them.

Vernon E. Jordan Jr., director of the Voter Education Project, says the political sophistication of black Southern officeholders varies greatly. Most state representatives are quite sophisticated; he points out that "half of the 14 black members of the Georgia Legislature are lawyers."

But most black officials hold city or county office. And many of these are unsophisticated. Especially in rural areas, many are lamentably uneducated, the inevitable consequence of an inept educational system. It is with these officials that discussions will be most elementary — and essential.

A number of nationally prominent black Americans will appear on panels or deliver speeches during the conference: State Rep. Julian Bond of Georgia; Lawrence T. Guyot Jr., chairman of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party; Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, noted psychologist and president of the Metropolitan Applied Research Center, New York City; Richard G. Hatcher, Mayor of Gary, Ind.; Robert G. Clark, the only black member of the Mississippi House of Representatives; Charles Evers, most influential black political leader in Mississippi; Mrs. Shirley Chisholm of New York City, the nation's first black congresswoman-elect.

Ramsay Clark, Attorney General of the United States, will address the conference banquet.

The Voter Education Project is footing the bill for transporting, housing, and feeding the conference participants. It would like to make the conference an annual event. For the foreseeable future, at least, it would seem greatly needed. But whether the Voter Education Project can do so depends on whether it can raise enough money to pay such a big bill every year.

Growing numbers

More blacks are in government today in the South than ever before. Since it is the first real venture into politics for many of them, experienced black politicians will meet with them shortly in Atlanta to offer advice on their new jobs.

33 Negro officials will attend parley

At least 33 of Alabama's 68 Negro public officeholders plan to attend the first Southern Conference of Black Elected Officials in Atlanta next week.

Speakers for the four-day event that begins Wednesday will include U.S. Atty. Gen. Ramsey Clark; Richard Hatcher, the Negro mayor of Gary, Ind.; Dr. Kenneth Clark of New York; Georgia State Rep. Julian Bond, and newly elected Congresswoman Shirley Chisholm of New York.

IN ADDITION to speeches, participants will attend workshops and panel discussions planned to let them discuss mutual problems and share experiences, and to help them do their jobs better.

Conference spokesmen said invitations have gone to the 151 city officials, 78 law enforcement officers and judges, 72 school board members, 55 county officials and 30 legislators from the 11 states of the Old South.

The meeting is being sponsored by the Southern Regional Conference.

Federal Help Near Limit, Negroes Told

Officials Hear Dr. Henderson Stress Local Level Work

By ACHSAH NESMITH

Negroes have "just about got all we are going to get from the national level," Dr. Vivian Henderson told the Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials Thursday.

"If the Nixon Cabinet appointments last night are any criteria, I know we have," the President of Clark College said. He added that he hoped "we're wrong about this," but stressed that Negro public officials must depend on their own political ability and backing from the community to achieve future gains.

Many of the gains of the past "have come in spite of ourselves," Dr. Henderson said, both because of national policies and "because of the power of the racial ghetto rather than political astuteness."

POLITICAL PERSONALITIES

"Politics among Negroes in Atlanta has been almost wholly oriented toward personalities. Atlanta desperately needs issue-oriented politics," he said.

The South's great strength in seeking to get into the economic, social and political mainstream of the nation is its lack of rigidly segregated housing patterns, allowing a "realistic opportunity to avoid the mistakes of the North and build a truly open society," as the South rapidly moves toward urbanization, he said. Atlanta and Houston, however, are plagued with segregated housing patterns, making them the two major exceptions in the South.

"We have yet to see in the South the kind of initiation of public policy measures at the local level" to bring about major improvements in the most serious social problems facing the nation, particularly urban areas, Dr. Henderson said.

CITES GHETTO SCHOOLS

"The issues are clear," he said, citing the poor quality of ghetto schools, delivery of services to the poor, inability to reach certain levels of government, the absence of minimum wage laws at the state and local level, and discrimination and gerrymandering in redistricting.

"We must re-examine the strategy of racial blocs," he declared. "I'm not too sure we can rely on racial solidarity to accomplish our goals," stressing again that President-elect Richard Nixon's Cabinet appointments indicate that this need is crucial.

"The only appeal of the incoming administration to the brothers and sisters is to call for black capitalism. I want all the Negro businessmen we can get, not just in Harlem but on Fifth Avenue, not just on Hunter Street and Auburn Avenue, but at Five Points; but it is an illusion to think this approach will transform the lives of the majority of brothers and sisters from poverty and destitution to minimum standards of living," he declared.

"This is the one carrot I've heard from Nixon." Henderson said. "Nixon didn't compete for the Negro vote," considering it a sure thing for his opponent, and "it suggests Negroes are left out and will be left out. We've had to depend on the national scene to get things done at the local scene. . . . We've got to rethink our strategy. It can't be done running in 40 different directions."

"I'm not a black nationalist or a black power advocate according to the rhetoric you hear," he said. "We're not at the point where we can abandon racial consciousness under the facade of color blindness. You have to represent all the people, but keep in mind that in 99 per cent of the cases those who elected you were black. Represent all the people, but give some special attention to the black brothers and sisters . . . the consequences of racial segregation can't be removed "with careful colorblindness," he added.

PART OF STRATEGY

"Color consciousness must be part of our political and urban strategy," he said, declaring there was nothing new about building black political power and self-respect, "but it does not mean building racism, hate, or a separate society. Negro life needs to be strengthened for intelligent integration into a pluralistic society, with respect for individuals and without the loss of identity of black institutions, not for establishing some mystique of black power or separatism but for achieving our rightful place in a multiracial society."

Henderson also said he was "deeply distressed as a college president over our failure" to help black officials to examine proposed legislaiton and formulate strategy and policy.

Earlier, Dr. Samuel DuBois Cook of Duke University's political science department told the conference of over 200 Negro elected officials from the South:

"You're here because the black man has the initiative for the first time except a brief period during Reconstruction. Because black men have power. The crucial question is what are you going to do with your power? History contains the tragic element of irreversibility."

Bond Says Negroes' Outlook Is Bleak

By BOB HURT

State Rep. Julian Bond dismissed the potential of Richard M. Nixon's new administration with a bitter prediction Wednesday night that Negroes "who still have faith in the democratic process" are facing four years of "severe disappointments."

In a speech that brought an audience of elected Southern Negro political leaders to a standing ovation, Bond said that white liberals and moderates "have deserted us" and Negroes in America must look for "new friends."

Bond, 28, who was swept into national prominence during the Democrtic National Convention in Chicago, was the keynote speaker of the first Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials which opened Wednesday at the Dinkler Plaza Hotel.

SEES 2 CRISES

He urged his audience to face what he termed the two greatest crises in America—"racism and militarism," and issued an icy-voiced condemnation of people who see "black capitalism" as the best tool for improving the lot of the Negro.

That plan is no more than "exchanging the race of the people who have been exploiting us," he said.

Instead, Bond said "we ought to become interested in—now here's a terrible, dirty word—community socialism. We should be interested in the kind of economic development in our community that will not only give us jobs but will give the community a profit as well."

CHARGES DESERTION

Bond said "Those on whom we used to depend have deserted us."

The support once given by organized labor vanished during the presidential campaign of George Wallace, who Bond described as a "hill-billy Hitler." The support of white liberals and moderates has wained because "the terrible war has attracted all of their attention."

In the speech, filmed by two national television networks, Bond said that liberals in Atlanta have failed Negroes when they were asked to "give us justice."

The Negro-moderate coalition in Atlanta "is wearing thin," he said, and is best illustrated by talk by whites who want to extend the city's boundaries to take in white suburbs.

MUST LOOK

The Negro must look to other minorities — Mexican-Americans, Puerto Ricans and American Indians — to form a new political coalition in the United States, Bond said.

Bond, who was once denied his seat in the General Assembly because he said he admired the courage of draft-card burners, said that the "American imperial war in Vietnam" is a major obstacle to racial harmony at home.

Negroes who go with whites and "burn down the huts of some Vietnam village" may return home and react to discrimination to the point that he "may be motivated to burn down the huts of some American village."

Bond's address came at the opening session of the three-day meeting of Negro elected officials, sponsored by the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council.

Clark Urges Extended Use Of U.S. Voting Examiners

(FULL TEXT of CLARK'S TALK ATTEND of FOLIO 4.)

By The Associated Press

Atty. Gen. Ramsey Clark says the use of federal voting examiners should be continued beyond 1970.

Clark told the Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials Friday night that the Federal Voting Rights Act of 1965 expires in August 1970.

He warned that the states will then have the opportunity to reinstate voter qualifications suspended by the act.

"State legislatures will be empowered to prescribe new standards, new procedures for voting throughout the land," Clark said.

The attorney general said the voting act has led to widespread increases in Negro voter registration and political gains for blacks.

FOUR YEARS ago, we could have held this meeting in a telephone booth in the lobby and not have interfered with anybody that wanted to make a telephone call," Clark commented.

He spoke to more than 200 Negro officeholders and told them that blacks and whites must prove they can live together because: "It's survival. It really is, you know."

Clark expressed disapproval of any type of racial separatism and called for pursuing efforts to end school segregation and "vast discrimination . . . in employment."

EARLIER, three Negro panelists discussed taxes and revenues. Gerald A. Lamb, Connecticut's treasurer, told the Negro officeholders, "We can excell in this field."

Others on the panel were Theodore A. Jones, director of the Illinois Department of Revenue, and Alfred M. Pelham, former Detroit comptroller who now is chairman of the board for Great Lakes Mutual Life Insurance Co.

Panel members agreed that taxation in this country has created inequitable burdens upon lower income groups, but warned higher taxes lie ahead.

Negro Politicians Watched, Voter Project Director Says

By HARMON PERRY

The letter to the Southern Regional Council from the Clarksdale, Miss., Negro who had taken office as justice of the peace was not in the best form and contained many misspelled words, but it told the story of many of the Negro men and women who have entered the political ring in the Deep South in recent years.

"I am grateful for the great service you gave the Negroes that were elected to office, you has (sic) helped many burdens roll away," the Negro wrote. "The things we are enduring are many but I am not discouraged at all, I am going to fight to finish whatever it may be."

Stories of harassment, intimidation, and lack of cooperation echoed throughout the first day of the Southwide conference of Negro elected officials meeting in Atlanta. The sessions are designed to help Negroes elected to a wide range of offices in 11 Southern states perform their responsibilities more effectively.

"THIS IS WHY we're here," said Vernon Jordon, SRC's Voter Education Project director, as he spoke at the banquet Wednesday night which got the four-day conference under way. The upsurge in tne number of Negroes elected to office since the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 is one of the more significant developments in Southern politics, he said.

"The Negro officeholders, most of whom carry into office the extra burden of inexperience because they had been denied living in the political process, are being observed by both races and are measured more exactly than are white officials," Mr. Jordon explained. "The conference hopes to solve some of the problems these black officials face."

State Rep. Julian Bond had a bit of encouragement for the 200 officials attending the conference. "I want to bring a little culture to you, but it's difficult to address you because we come from so many different backgrounds."

Rep. Bond, who devoted much of his address to an attack on the Vietnam war and President-elect Nixon and his incoming administration, said there were three things he and his audience had in common, "We're politicians, we're black, and we were elected largely by black constituents."

The young Georgia legislator was cool to proposals for black capitalism in black communities, saying it only ends up as white capitalism that hires and trains Negro workers.

He called for Negroes to seek out allies among other colored minorities and poor whites who have been blinded by racism. "We ought not turn anybody down."

REP. BOND also said black people should control their communities, become aware of the things that turn them against their own interest and develop concern in community socialism.

"We need fast action, but we must look at it with care; we

Charlie Jones Talks About His Victory

ATLANTA CONSTITUTION

Charlie Jones caught a plane for the first time Wednesday to come to Atlanta to the Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials from his home in Coahoma, Miss.

Elected justice of the peace there over a white incumbent of over 20 years who had originally decided not to run, and then did after Jones announced, Charlie Jones observed that he had never been away from Coahoma for more than 20 days at a time, though his travels have taken him to Florida, Canada and many Northern cities.

"I've known the white man I beat for 50 years," the genial father of 12 said.

He explains the political realities of his area in Mississippi simply. There are roughly 1,300 Negroes and 300 whites (Charlie can tell you to the man in each precinct). "There wasn't hardly no way he could beat me, lessen I was a mighty bad fellow."

Jones is a sharp contrast to young Negro politicians at the conference such as Julian Bond in style, background and fame, but he is as typical of one segment of the men and women who have come into political office in the South as a result of civil and voting rights legislation, registration campaigns and the first true "black power" at the ballot box.

"When Moses needed to get across the Sea of Galilee God didn't dry up the earth or clear away the whole sea. He just cleared a path. That's all Moses needed, just a path," Charlie Jones told a reporter as he ate lunch in the ballroom of a hotel that a few years ago would have refused to serve him.

"A path always leads to the highway," he added, "not the other way around, just like a stream leads to the ocean of you follow it. If it wasn't for all the little creeks and ponds and bayous and rivers the ocean would dry up," Charlie Jones added.

"When I went to school, we didn't have school but three months. White folks would keep you out of work, but I sent my children through 12 grades and some two years of junior college. If they'll just do the same thing for their children—" he said, leaving the obvious conclusion unsaid. But he added, "You don't learn all you know from books, and you don't learn all you read in books. You've got to experience some things to understand it."

He used to drive people to Memphis, he said, and when he took them to a place to eat, they would go in and a waiter would bring him something outside.

Now he can go in those places, but he generally goes down the road instead, to places where ought to consider an attack made on one of us as an attack on all of us," Rep. Bond advised.

AT THE FIRST general session Thursday morning, Dr. Samuel DuBois Cook told the conferees their presence was the result of black men having power, and the power to have more power.

The question is, "What are you going to do with it now that you are elected?" Dr. Cook asked.

Speaking on "From Subject and Victim to Citizen and Official," Dr. Cook said the liberation of black people is the key to Southern liberation.

"Racism has dominated and controlled the minds of the white South," he said, "so the South will be fully free only when the black man is fully free."

"Once freed from the yoke of racism, the South—and the nation—will take wings," Dr. Cook said.

"I saw a terrible thing in Chicago," he said. "People have to lock their car doors to ride on the streets or they're liable to have somebody in there with them. Black Power Brings Only Limited Gains

Atlanta Daily World 12/14/68

By PORTIA SCOTT

"Black Power can only bring limited gains. It can not eliminate poverty, poor housing, poor education or give us a portion of economic control of nation," Mayor Richard Gordon Hatcher told a capacity audience at Clark College Thursday night.

Black Power, Student Power and violence as has occurred here, said Hatcher cannot be dismissed from achieving power, yet this type of power has not payed off very much. "It has just made whites talk better," he added.

The Mayor of Gary, Ind., explained that he supported all Black Power that helps to "capture its heritage and exert ability to meet its demands," but the type of power that was really needed was "a coming together in State Militancy or People's Power."

The occasion was a public forum at Davage Auditorium that climaxed the Thursday session of the Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials, sponsored by the Southern Regional Council, which will continue through Saturday at the Dinkler Plaza Hotel.

The speaker continued that he could accept the possibility of "separate states, but what Blacktown wants Whitetown will not confer." Hatcher pointed out further that even in Blacktown there still would not be utopia because Blacks can be expected to exploit Blacks as whites have.

Also, he said that he could understand a return not only spiritually, but physicially to our African culture, but that he himself did not choose to leave. "A good portion of these United States we own not just physicially, but morally," he asserted.

The speaker, soft in his tone, yet firm in his speech, said that search for power isn't new, but today, "we have combined pride with being Black with the search."

There are many forms of Black Power that can meet the needs of Black people, he stated.

"Whites have assigned to us the role of being strangers within his village. But being ourselves will make us less a stranger.

"We cannot nor wish to reject our Blackness," he continued.

Hatcher explained that it was fortunate that our history and culture is rich enough to find pride to make us less a stranger in the white man's village.

He pointed out that the world is not white any longer and never will be again. He warned that "we must establish power of people in the world which none are strangers."

Without this, he continued, "dark nights and despair" are ahead. He added, Blacks have less to loose but most to gain."

Other speakers included Robert Clark, Representative from Mississippi; Henry Marsh, City Council, Richmond, Va.; and John McCown, County Comm., Hancock County, Ga., who were part of a panel discussion on the Mayor's address and the issues of the conference as a whole.

President Vivian Henderson (Clark), presided over the session.

Editorial Comment on the Conference

The Use of Black Power

"Black power" is a much used and often misused slogan in black Americans' drive for justice and equal opportuunity.

But what happens when black power is achieved—when Negroes are elected to office? Then the focus of interest must shift from power to responsible use of power.

Then black officials must become concerned with taxation, federal aid programs, law enforcement, administration . . . in short, the same concerns as white officials.

Just such practical matters will be the subjects of discussion at a four-day Southwide conference which opened at the Dinkler Plaza here last night under the sponsorship of the Southern Regional Council's Voter Education Project.

Racial matters, of course, will be much in the minds of the participants, for this is an historic gathering. Thanks largely to the Voting Rights Act of 1965, there are now nearly 400 black elected officials in the South. About half of them are here for the meeting.

Not only will they discuss problems among themselves, but they also will hear from fellow Afro-Americans from other regions who hold such offices as mayor, state treasurer and state director of revenue.

Among the many notables attending are Mayor Richard Hatcher of Gary, Ind.; Atty. Gen. Ramsey Clark; Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, president of the Metropolitan Applied Research Center; M. Carl Holman, vice president of The Urban Coalition; Congresswoman-elect Shirley Chisholm of New York, and Mississippi civil rights leader Charles Evers.

It is noteworthy that Atlanta not only is the site of the conference, but that it has many black persons in political office and other positions of importance to act as hosts and panelists. These range from the director of the Voter Education Project to federal officials, an alderman, businessmen, a college president and several state legislators.

We Commend Vernon Jordan And Black Elected Officials

Between 200 and 300 of the South's black elected officials are converging here this week for their first Southwide Conference. The Conference, sponsored by the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council, features some outstanding speakers including U. S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark, Mayor Richard Hatcher of Gary, Indiana, Dr. Kenneth Clark of New York, Rep. Julian Bond of our fair city and the nation's first Negro Congresswoman, Mrs. Shirley Chisholm of New York.

It should be an interesting, productive conference. We hope the officials enjoy Atlanta hospitality and will return again for either business or pleasure.

More significantly, we hail the meeting because it represents the power of education. With some die-hards trying at every turn and utilizing every hook and crook to "hold us down," the officials meeting here are living examples of the fact that politics will be the great beneficiary of education.

Many of the elected officials are members of school boards and, consequently, even more significance is attached because they are in positions to rid this country of its unfair dual system of education. Its abolition would mean even greater advancement through education for all of our people.

We welcome the Conference and its members and gleefully urge, "Giddyap" for the job ahead.

The INQUIRER salutes Vernon E. Jordan, director of the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council, for his wisdom and foresight in instituting this first Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials.

Mr. Jordan believes the "dramatic increase of black officials represents one of the more significant developments in Southern politics today. Not even the fact," he says, "that five Southern states gave George Wallace his only electoral votes can overshadow the deepening involvement of black Southerners in the region's political process."

We hope, as he and the officials hope, they will be able to establish at this conference some machinery for dealing with the problems on a continuing basis in the future as the number of black elected officials continues to grow.

We hope further that they will find it imperative to continue these conferences so that they might be able to grandly produce in behalf of their constituents.

We highly commend Mr. Jordan and the officials meeting here who seek the means to work toward that end.

The South and the Law

ONE OF THE strong undertones at the Southwide Conference for Black Elected Officials, which ended over the weekend in Atlanta, was frustration approaching bitterness about what is expected of the Nixon administration.

Is it exaggerated? It may be. But it is significant that this view is prevalent among men and women who have fought great odds and often endured great hardship and intimidation to win a toehold in Southern political life. They know they had to do it against the toughest kind of state and local opposition. They know they had to rely upon the federal government's enforcement of the Constitution of the United States.

That enforcement often has faltered. Indeed, for a century even the federal government ignored the 14th Amendment (requiring "equal protection of the laws" and requiring that a state's representation in Congress be reduced if it disfranchised people because of race) and the 15th Amendment (further guaranteeing that states could not deny people the right to vote because of race).

WHY WAS THE law of the land ignored? This sad chapter in the nation's history began with the compromise of 1877, in which reactionary Southern power changed a presidential race's outcome in exchange for agreement that the law would not be enforced.

Most of the 225 Negro officials who gathered in Atlanta were elected for this reason only: The defenders of Southern wrongs, fighting under a false banner of states' rights, finally failed to prevent the federal courts from applying the Constitution and failed to prevent passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

In short, these officials were here because the federal government finally renounced the wicked compromise of 1877.

The rights that have been restored, after a century's neglect, are not firmly fixed. An administration has just been elected which has talked weak enforcement. Many white people may not know what that means. But the black officials who assembled here know what it means.

ATTY. GEN. RAMSEY Clark, in an extemporaneous speech obviously coming from deep conviction as an official and as a white Southerner, called attention to another ugly compromise required by the defenders of the worst in the South. To get the Voting Rights Act through Congress, it was necessary to accept a cutoff date in the effectiveness of some of its main provisions. Mr. Clark referred to "the expiration of some of the most important sanctions and controls in what seemed a long time then but now seems no time—Aug. 8, 1970." Will it be extended?

State and local governments at that time may return to the devices which many have used to keep Negroes outside working democracy, such as discriminatory use of literacy tests. The Department of Justice no longer will be able to rectify local abuses by sending in voting examiners (registrars).

Further, Mr. Clark noted, the most effective federal device for requiring enforcement of the Constitution on school segregation—guidelines and their enforcement—now may be gutted.

FEW SOUTHERN spokesmen in Congress stood up for the Voting Rights Act. (Two who did, Congressmen Charles Weltner and James Mackay from the two Atlanta districts, have been defeated, as have some others). Is it any wonder that Negroes who finally have gained a small place in Southern democracy are deeply disturbed about what will happen if the Nixon administration is in effect weak on the Constitution?

This was only a conference. The President-elect may not have taken note of it. But he must not ignore the sentiment it represented, or the fact that the South's best sons white and black (of whom Ramsey Clark is one) do not want any subtle slipping back to the ugliest part of its past.

Southerners At Their Best

Pre-Christmas traffic was heavy along Atlanta's streets and darkness was coming on when I turned into a hotel entrance. It was with a feeling of expectancy and some excitement that I entered and went to the table where the first Southwide conference of black elected officials was being registered. More than 200 of some 385 such officials, all chosen in local, county and state elections, were in attendance.

This conference, surely unique, certainly a first, unquestionably historic, was sponsored by the Voter Education Project of the privately financed Southern Regional Council.

For me, as well as many others, the fact of the conference was an emotional experience. I stood there recalling the winter of 1944—almost a quarter century ago. In that time meetings were held discussing the merging of the old Commission on Interracial Cooperation, founded in 1919, with a new organization of broader scope and potential.

The Problems

The old commission had concerned itself, necessarily and realistically, with the immediate problems of the time—lynchings, which were many and brutal, justice in the courts — and with providing a bridge across which the separated races of the South might find a way to meet, talk and work together toward ends that would make for a better South and nation.

The new organization was called the Southern Regional Council. Its board included 80 Southerners from both races, representing major religious faiths and 13 states in the region. It set about to collect facts, to learn what the real conditions were, what the people wanted, thought, believed.

In 1951 the Council officially committed itself to the aim of an unsegregated society—not a society in which the Negro became "like" a white man, but one in which he had his own pride and identity as a black-skinned American.

It was not always easy. But the Council persisted. It demonstrated merit. It was fortunate in executive directors and staff.

Now, as I stood, remembering, it was December 1968.

In 1944 there was a comparative handful of Southern Negroes registered to vote—most of them in a few of the larger cities, Atlanta included. The number of Negroes holding public office could be counted on the fingers of one hand. The offices held were all minor ones.

Elected Officials

Now, in 1968, due in considerable measure to the Council's Voter Education Project, there are some 385 elected black officials. (In 1965 there were only 70.) The number of registered black voters in the 13 states today is 3¼ million. In 1944 it was approximately ¼ million.

The conference in Atlanta brought together the Negro officeholders-elect for political "schooling." What has happened has been, and is, one of the miracles of the democratic process. The black Southerner could not really everywhere freely register to vote until the congressionally enacted voter rights laws of 1964. These did not become truly effective until 1965.

In this historic conference the school board members meet in workshops, the city hall officials in another, county officers in still another, and so on.

These newly elected black men—most of them recall being denied the ballot—come from many segregated backgrounds. They lack political education and sophistication. Some, from rural areas, are products of segregated schools and, therefore, lack education. A few will be subjected to sabotage through noncooperation and opposition.

It gave one a feeling of pride in his region and country to see the Southerner and the South at its best.

After all, it is not so long from 1944 to 1968! And there is more to be done. Much more.

FREEING THE WHITE SOUTH? ATLANTA JOURNAL 12-13-68

Some Black History-Makers Talk About It

By REESE CLEGHORN

"I WAS WHITE once," said the black man from Virginia. He was as white as anybody could be, he continued, deadpan, a Stars-and-Bars white Southerner. He had changed, he said, because of drinking a lot of bad, black coffee, with very little cream and sugar.

"When I was white we had many discussions about you people," he said, and the appreciative snickers in his largely Negro audience became a rush of laughter. "We had many fears about you people," he went on. "We feared one day you might decide there was some place to meet besides the church—that you might meet at the ballot box."

This was City Councilman Joseph A. Jordan Jr. of Norfolk, Va., speaking to some 225 fellow black office-holders from throughout the South.

They are a majority of the 380 Negroes who have been elected (107 of them last month) in this region. They have come to Atlanta for a four-day conference, under auspices of the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council, to discuss their common problems, the duties of their offices and current issues.

The fear that Councilman Jordan talked about having, before he drank all that black coffee, are very real among large numbers of white Southerners.

THAT IS ONE OF the obstacles the black office-holders have to overcome. They are, of course, a diverse lot with diverse ideas about how to play their history-making roles.

An open discussion of their concerns revealed the diversity.

Black office-holders should play broad roles of leadership, said Lawrence Guyot, leader of the Freedom Democratic Party in Mississippi. They should not just discharge the duties of local offices; they should speak for their once-voiceless communities in an aggressive and wide-ranging way. They should consider themselves the leading spokesmen of black people.

BUT, SAID A MAN from Arkansas, it is not as simple as that. He had been elected not mainly by Negroes but mainly by whites. "If this conference is to be relevant," he said, "it must include situations like that."

Nothing can be accomplished by Negroes, said a man from South Carolina, "until we realize we are all black." He seemed to suggest that aggressive representation of Negroes was the first duty.

A COUNTY COMMISSIONER from Virginia interjected. He is one of five commissioners, he said, and the other four are "rednecks if you want to call them that." His job, he said, is to make friends and win allies on that commission. "I couldn't get a second for a motion, much less a road or a teachers' raise, if I didn't do that," he said.

"I had been an extreme radical," he went on. "After I was elected, I learned I had to be effective. A lot of people brainwashed by the more radical elements call us Uncle Toms."

THERE WAS A STIRRING in the room. This is the kind of talk sometimes heard from timid men, and most Negroes do not fancy that they are electing people these days to be timid. But it also could be the talk of a determined but practical man, one who wants to be an effective politician. Which was it in this case? Probably nobody at this conference would ever know. It would depend upon that man who shortly would go back to do his job, against the odds, in rural Virginia.

That is the way it is for many of these new office-holders, who have won a place in the democracy at last because of voting laws opposed by almost all the Deep South's congressmen and senators. Many serve in lonely places. At this conference, they could get a feeling of common endeavor with others in similar situations across the South.

WHAT IS THE BROADER significance of their situation? Dr. Samuel DuBois Cook, former Atlantan who now teaches at Duke University, spoke to them as a political scientist and as a fellow black man.

". . . The black man, because of the tyranny of racism over the mind of the white South, has been able, without intention or knowledge, to dominate Southern political and governmental life . . .," he said. "Whites fell into the trap they had so cleverly and determinedly made for blacks: absolute dominion. . . . The Negro, like a fearsome ghost, has haunted and driven the white man."

Now, he said, Negroes have gained a toehold. What will it mean?

"NEGROES CAN HELP REDEEM the past of the Southern political process. They can be liberating and redemptive agents. Just as the Negro was the key to Southern political enslavement, he is the key to Southern political emancipation.

"The Southern genius has been exhausted in the 'race problem.' Black men, working with whites of reason, goodwill, and a sense of justice can largely free the South from the chains and illusions of the past. The chief problem is racism.

"Freed from the prison of racism, the South will be freed from the heavy yoke of deceit, hypocrisy, negativism, obstructionism and provincialism. . . . It will be freed of the exhausting and painful efforts to maintain a closed corporation. . . . Freed of the Atlas burden of racism, the Southern political process will be able to say, ironically, with Martin Luther King: 'Free at last!' "

Welcome To Southern Elected Officials

ATLANTA DAILY SRC WORLD 12-14-68

The meeting in Atlanta this week of nearly 400 Negro elected officials from various sections of the south is a good omen of a sincere effort to seek for a consensus of opinion to meet the problems confronting us today. Such a meeting is indeed appropriate and imely. 12-14-68

We congratulate these officials and the Southern Regional Council for its sponsorship. The session started Wednesday night and runs through part of Saturday.

We hope such a meeting is held at least once a year from now on. Atlanta Daily World

In the light of the role the Negro voters in this region and the nation as a whole, we believe it would be most timely for these officials, in a closed door session, give some time to discussing the merits of bi-partisan action in certain elections.

Through the years we have emphasized the importance of intelligent political action as an effective means of solving racial problems and opening new opportunities.

We also recognize the necessity for the preservation of a strong two-party system in our nation if the democratic process is to survive.

If this current meeting of Negro elected officials could have been held prior to the recent balloting for president, perhaps a consensus of opinion could have been reached which would have prevented candidate George Wallace from carrying a single state. The Negroes had the votes to do it.

Our officials should try to take a broad bi-partisan view of issues and problems, rather than the narrow partisan view, and they can strive to be statesmen, instead of mere politicians.

Again, we congratulate and commend the efforts of this conference.

Blacks in Office

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1968

'One of the Miracles of the Democratic Process'

ATLANTA—More than 200 of the South's 385 Negro elected officials gathered in Atlanta last week, and the most remarkable thing to many of those who saw it was that it had occurred at all.

"Four years ago," Attorney General Ramsey Clark said in a speech Friday, "we could have held this meeting in the telephone booth in the lobby—and not interfered with anybody who wanted to make a phone call."

The black officials, who included state legislators such as Julian Bond of Georgia and law enforcement officers such as Sheriff Lucius D. Amerson of Macon County, Ala., plus holders of many humbler posts, actually filled a fair-sized banquet hall. In this alone, Southerners with sharp memories found a monument.

Bi-Racial Communications

Ralph McGill, the columnist who is publisher of the Atlanta Constitution, recalled some of the first tentative and almost timid moves toward bi-racial communications in the region nearly 25 years ago.

"For me, as well as many others, the fact of the conference [last week] was an emotional experience," Mr. McGill wrote. "...what has happened has been, and is, one of the miracles of the democratic process."

The assembled officeholders did more than dramatize the impact of the Federal Voting Rights Act of 1965 and the registration campaigns which together have increased Negro enrollment to more than 3.1 million.

Their first Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials, sponsored by the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council, also brought out some differences in outlook and approach. "These guys don't all think alike," said Vernon E. Jordan Jr., the project director. "They've all got their own ideas, their own approaches, and their own special political problems."

Black Underrepresentation

Negroes remain under-represented in the South and most of those who hold public office find themselves pressed to assume broader responsibilities for blacks outside their immediate area and jurisdiction. While some argued for a more activist role, involving devices such as "extra-legal hearings" to pressure white conservatives, others insisted that the Negro should take pains to do their own jobs well.

At the conference, most of the officials appeared to concentrate on more specific problems such as detailed legal matters and the bewildering complexities of obtaining money from Washington. As representatives of some of the most poverty-stricken areas of the country, they displayed an intimate sense of local shortcomings on everything from street lights to housing projects.

Many of the officials are inexperienced and some are poorly educated. To help out, the voter project disclosed plans to establish "service centers" for black leaders in Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia.

Mr. Jordan, who indicated that centers would begin operating next month in connection with predominantly Negro colleges, said they will provide information and supply student interns to work in the more demanding offices.

Some participants complained that in emphasizing the more specific problems, the conference had failed to generate ideas for over-all programs to help Negroes on a regional or even national basis. "They're so broken apart in so many little pieces it's terrible," one critic said. "Somebody ought to be filling out a national perspective. They're supposed to be advocates, but I haven't met anybody who's mad yet."

Practically all the Negro officials lead lonely lives in their dealings with white colleagues. The lone Negro on a Louisiana city council observed sadly: "If I argue for it, everybody gets real quiet."

But they appear to be learning the ropes. A constable from Mississippi calmly explained to a law-enforcement seminar that he had the right to chase lawbreakers out of his district and even out of the county.

The stocky, slow-talking lawman explained that he receives fees for each task he performs, and he obesrved whimsically that "the farther I run him the more money I stand to make."

Yes, We Can Bring Equal Justice

ATLANTA JOURNAL 12-26-68

Voting Rights Act of 1965 Slowly Opens Many Doors

By ATTY. GEN. RAMSEY CLARK

We are here tonight because we are a democracy and a democracy that will ultimately extend equal justice to all of its people. We are here tonight because we are making progress toward that end. We are making progress because we care.

I well remember the long nights in the Department of Justice in the winter of 1964 when we were trying to find the legal techniques for a voting rights act. I well remember President Johnson's deep personal commitment to liberating the Negro, the minority in America; to bring the vote to all Americans.

As the principal federal officer in charge of the enforcement of the federal court order under which the march from Selma to Montgomery took place in the Spring of '65, I had the privilege to see great men—brave men, men who believed in America—march that we might be here tonight. Dr. Martin Luther King was in the front rank.

THEN THERE was that moment, August 6, 1965, when the rotunda of the nation's Capitol was filled with the nation's great and the President of the United States signed the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and it became the law of the land.

I know there are thousands and thousands of people in these United States who have come to doubt and some who do not believe, that this nation has either the purpose or the capability to bring equal justice to all of its citizens.

You demonstrate better than anything perhaps, that this is not so; that the system, however awkward, however slow, can work; that our purpose as a people and the purpose of our laws is equality and justice for all.

About the Forum Writer

U. S. ATTY. GEN. RAMSEY CLARK recently addressed some 225 of the South's 380 elected Negro officials attending the Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials. The conference at Atlanta was under auspices of the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council. This is part of that address.

Mr. Clark, who shortly will leave office, is a Texan, the son of retired Supreme Court Justice Tom Clark. He has served as attorney general since 1966.

• The Voting Rights Act is a bold experiment in democracy. It has made a difference. Four years ago we could have held this meeting in the telephone booth in the lobby and not interfere with anybody who wanted to make a phone call.

THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT of 1965, like every contested piece of legislation, has compromises. One compromise was the expiration in five years of many of the most important sanctions and controls in what then seemed a long time and now seems no time. On Aug. 8, 1970, there will be the opportunity for jurisdictions to reinstate qualifications to vote through subjective tests such as literacy.

Then, unless something is done, the power of the Department of Justice to place examiners and obervers in places where they are needed to protect the fundamental right of a demoratic people will expire. Then state legislatures may prescribe new standards, new procedures, for voting throughout this land.

IT SEEMS IMPERATIVE to me that we redouble our efforts today to enlist in the support of democracy, under the auspices of the Voting Rights Act and this great Voter Education Project, all of our people; that we provide for the future by extending the sanctions of the Voting Rights Act of '65 for years to come. Their necessity, to me, seems clear.

I WILL NOT be fair if I say that voting, the right to vote, the exercise of that right, is the entire solution. We must go forward, seriously, on many fronts and with rare courage: the rare courage that you black elected officials have shown us and of which I am grateful. We know the areas. We sometimes think that because the struggle is so difficult perhaps, the road isn't clear; but it is. Separate-but-equal was never so; could not be; will never be. There can be no equality with separation in any society, least of all in a highly urban and complex nation of 200 million such as ours. Separation must be ended, and all of its manifestations, to bring equality. The task is terribly difficult.

ONE AREA is education. Start with the children. Education is America's greatest industry. One in three in this country is engaged, full time, in education as student, teachers or administrator. In 1954, May 17, the Supreme Court said that as to public schooling there can be no separation. For nine years, through litigation in the courts of the South, the constitutional rights of our citizens were litigated.

IN SEPTEMBER, 1963, those who knew saw one per cent of the Negro children in the public schools of the 11 states of the Confederacy in schools that were desegregated. "All deliberate speed" meant nine centuries. People with vision saw this.

People of determination changed it, in large measure, because of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, because of Title VI, because of the much-maligned guidelines of the Office of Education promulgated in conformity with law thereunder.

One per cent in '63 became 16 per cent in '67 and when the returns are in, this will surely be over 20 per cent in '68. This law that has had barely three years to work its way has made a major difference and has shown that the constitutional rights of our citizens in the South can be fulfilled.

BUT BECAUSE of the immensity of this nation, while we concentrated here where the need was so great we barely noticed the new segregation building up steadily and swiftly in urban America.

In five short years, 1950-1955, the percentage of Negro children in the public schools of Baltimore increased from 50 to 61. In St. Louis, it was from 49 to 60. In Chicago from 42 to 50. A profound change reflecting patterns of living meant a new segregation in Central City America unless we awoke.

Slowly the resources of the law are brought to bear and now four suits, outside the South, are brought to desegregate our schools there. Soon we must recognize, among other things, that the litigations that take so long and the guideline techniques that can work so well must be brought to bear elsewhere. And soon we must recognize that segregation in schooling is incompatible with our principles and I believe with the Constitution, whatever the cause.

ON THE FOREFRONT today, we are moving in the area of employment; and only beginning. There is vast discrimination in employment: the opportunity to get a job, to keep a job, to improve in your job, to get a better job.

The '64 Act, Title VII promised to remedy this. It is essential that we enlist all of our energies, as a people, to do it. Today, we have brought finally 34 suits. When you think of the immense industry of the United States, you see how very slow the beginning is. Twenty-four this year, with so far to go.

ONE REASON you must understand. For all the might of the federal government, the resources that we, as a peo- have provided there are terribly inadequate.

• The Civil Rights Division as devoted a group a people to the principles of this country that has ever been collected in one place—with one mission, in my judgment—is fewer than a hundred lawyers. Their average age is under 30.

• Their burden is to enforce the Voting Rights Act to litigate school desegregation in perhaps 30,000 school districts over the U. S.; to bring Title II of the Act, promising open accommodation, to a reality; to enforce all of our civil rights laws.

• This small resource would be inadejquate for one state. It would be inadequate for one single law throughout the U.S.

THE REASONS that black and white in America must show the world that they can live together with respect, with stability and with love are many.

One is human dignity—my dignity, your dignity. Another is to remove this gross imperfection from our national character: to show that we can be what we say we are.

BUT THERE IS another. It is survival. It really is, you know. We will add on this planet, in the next decade, one billion souls and most will be blacks, and browns and yellows. Millions will starve. And millions will live in more than affluence; amidst surfeit, then will have more than they can use.

SCIENCE and technology—with 90 per cent of the scientists who ever lived working today—and population explosions compel now equality.

And if we do not demonstrate that it is possible, here in America, black and white together with love and strength, then this poor, tired world has more ahead than it can handle.

PROCEEDINGS

SOUTHWIDE CONFERENCE OF BLACK ELECTED OFFICIALS

DEC. 11-14, 1968

DINKLER HOTEL
ATLANTA, GEORGIA

Sponsored by
The Voter Education Project
Southern Regional Council, Inc.
Atlanta, Georgia

PREFACE

Late in 1967 and early in 1968, as it became apparent that the number of black elected officials in the South was growing rapidly and would continue to do so in the months ahead, the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council conceived the idea of a southwide conference for these officials. Most—indeed, almost all—had been elected in the middle '60s as black voter registration advanced markedly.

Being closely associated with the dramatic registration increases of the '60s, VEP felt an obligation to the officials who had been elected largely as a result of these voter gains. Most of the officials had little political experience—or, indeed, previous contact with the political process—and giving assistance to these officials is an important part of VEP's broad goal of extending political participation. Moveover, it was felt that a regional meeting would be a means of bolstering the spirits of black officials, many of whom serve in extremely trying circumstances, and motivating prospective black officials throughout the South.

A number of foundations were approached with requests to supply special funds for such a conference. Almost all responded not only with approval, but also with enthusiasm. Arrangements then went forward to bring all the black elected officials to Atlanta for a four-day conference, with all expenses to be paid by VEP. The Rev. John Morris, former executive director of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity, was employed to coordinate the conference.

It was decided that a variety of workshops would be held for the elected officials, in addition to general sessions (see conference agenda, Page 2). A date subsequent to the November 5 general election was picked so that officials then elected could be invited to the conference. (It was determined that only elected officials would be invited, since the list of appointed black officials is even larger and more varied than the list of elected officials.)

Of approximately 385 Negroes holding elected positions in the South in late 1968, nearly 200 attended the conference, which was the first of its kind ever held in the South. The Voter Education Project is grateful to the foundations and to the individuals who contributed in countless ways to the success of the conference. The results of the program planning described above are presented in these conference proceedings.

'...A More Just Society...'

The Rev. John Morris, coordinator of the Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials and an Episcopal priest, delivered the invocation at the opening dinner Dec. 11. The Rev. Mr. Morris was in charge of planning the program and making arrangements for the conference. He is a founder and former executive director of the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity.

ALMIGHTY GOD, Who hast given us this good land for our heritage and helped us to begin to turn back the forces of oppression and injustice;

BEHOLD NOW Thy people who have gathered here in the pursuit of greater service of their fellow man. Grant that these days may be both profitable in helping us build a more just society and a witness to the spirit of free men.

THOU WHO are Lord of Lords and King of Kings, hidden and yet on every side, preserve from self-serving ambition those to whom the authority of government is entrusted; but, rather, give them an untiring zeal to see that Thy will is done and all men are free before they rest.

AS WE MEET we also honor the memory of thy servant, Martin, whose vision of a beloved community still beckons, and whose death reminds us of the sacrifice of many who have gone before.

FOR his love and for Thine we are grateful; and for our fellowship here and the food of which we are about to partake.

BLESSED ART THOU, Lord of the harvest, who bringest forth bread from the wheat fields and wine from the vineyard. Keep us in Thy love for ever and ever.

AMEN.

'...A Rapidly Growing List...'

Text of opening remarks by Vernon E. Jordan Jr., director of the Voter Education Project, Dec. 11.

Three years ago, just after passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, the Southern Regional Council compiled a list of elected Negro officeholders in the South. The list totaled just over 70 names.

Today, counting some 80 black candidates elected for the first time in the Nov. 5 general election, the list totals over 380 names. The roster thus is more than five times as large today as it was just three years ago.

This dramatic increase is one of the more significant developments in Southern politics today. Not even the fact that five Southern states gave George Wallace his only electoral votes can overshadow the deepening involvement of black Southerners in the region's political process.

It is true, of course, that most of these officials were elected by predominantly black voting lists and are a result of heavy increases in Negro registration. Indeed, many represent all-black districts—as do, for example, the mayors and councilmen in all-black towns. Nevertheless there are some black officeholders—notably several of the legislators—who represent districts in which large numbers of white voters live. In any event, the list of black officeholders is growing very rapidly and will continue to do so in the months ahead.

This rapid growth in the number of Negro officeholders poses a new issue for Negroes in the South—a welcome issue, but an issue nevertheless. That issue is how to make these new officeholders as effective as possible in filling their offices. Like politicians of all races, black officeholders must be able to produce in behalf of their constituents. But Negro officeholders face several additional problems.

Black voters often feel that officeholders should produce instantly, almost magically, all those benefits and services that had been denied down through the years by callous white officials. Usually—almost always—this is impossible.

In many cases the Negro officeholder finds himself serving Negroes who live outside his district but have no spokesman. Thus a Negro legislator—to use that office as an example—might find himself speaking on some issues for all the Negroes in the state.

The Negro officeholder is being observed closely by both races. Some of the watching eyes are friendly, but many are hostile. Often the new Negro officeholder will be measured by yardsticks far more exacting than those applied to his white predecessors. The difficulty that Julian Bond had in claiming his seat in the Georgia Legislature stands as an example of the sort of roadblocks that can be thrown in the way of black elected officials.

Finally, most of the newly elected black officials carry a heavy burden of political inexperience. Historically, the white political structure of the South has deliberately and systematically denied blacks the opportunity to gain experience in the political process.

This is the sort of practical problems we will be dealing with these four days at the first Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials. We will not solve all the problems at one conference. But we hope to establish, at this conference, some machinery for dealing with the problems on a continuing basis in the future, as the number of black elected officials continues to grow.

'...An Attack on All of Us...'

Rep. Julian Bond of Atlanta opened the four-day Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials with a keynote speech Dec. 11 at a dinner. Rep. Bond, refused his seat by the Georgia House of Representatives because of his opposition to the war in Vietnam, was elected three times before he was seated by order of the U. S. Supreme Court in 1967. The 28-year-old legislator's name was placed before the 1968 Democratic National Convention as a nominee for vice president.

It is difficult to know what to say to an audience like this one. We come from so many different backgrounds, we hold so many different jobs, we have so many different ambitions. All that we have in common is the fact that we are politicians, we are black, and we are very largely elected by black constituencies.

Those last two facts are the most important—our race and the race of people whom we represent, the people who have chosen us to make important decisions for them.

Without knowing what kinds of people have selected you, let me tell you something about the people I am proud and privileged to represent in the Georgia General Assembly—the citizens of the 111th House district of Fulton County.

They are almost all black—nearly 85 per cent of them. They are nearly all poor—their average yearly income per family is $2,500. They have trouble finding work—unemployment in my district runs between 30 and 40 per cent. They are poorly educated—on the average they completed only the sixth grade. Most of the men have trouble finding work, and so the labor force in my district is predominantly female. You all know the kind of work poorly educated black women do—day work, domestic service, cleaning someone else's kitchen, caring for someone else's children.

Incidentally, the white citizens of my district share the same condition; but unfortunately for them, most of them think that somehow the color of their skin makes their small amount of money go further, or that their whiteness makes their poor sixth grade education better than the one my black constituents have.

But the point of all these statistics is simply to demonstrate that my constituents are probably very much like yours—they are poor and black, and they depend on government, very largely—their city and county and state governments and their federal governments—to help them do the things they are unable to do themselves. That is why they have chosen you to represent them, because they still retain some faith in the power of the democratic process to solve people's problems.

I am very much afraid that for the next several years they are in for some disappointments.

If your constituents are like mine—and like most other black Americans—they voted very heavily for Vice President Humphrey. They wanted him to be President. They may have had some other first choice, but that was denied them by an assassin in Los Angeles. They may even, like I did, have had a second choice; but that was denied them by democracy in Chicago. So therefore they voted for Mr. Humphrey. He represented warmth, while one can only find coldness in the iciness we now hear described as the "new" Nixon.

So while we were voting one way, the rest of the country voted another. They chose a man who said he didn't expect to get black votes and therefore never sought them out; they chose a man who said he was publicly for open housing but privately against it, and they chose a man who says the federal government is enforcing the 1954 Supreme Court decision too swiftly.

They chose a man who has tremendous power to set a positive or a negative future for black Americans.

—He perhaps may choose five new Supreme Court justices and therefore may determine the nature of the decisions that Court makes in civil rights cases over the rest of this century.

—He will certainly choose a new attorney general and a new head of the civil rights division of the Department of Justice and will decide how vigorously—or whether at all—they enforce the legislation that affects us most vitally.

—He is going to name the staff and set the budget for the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, the Department of Housing and Urban Development, and the Office of Economic Opportunity. He will determine how these agencies respond when they are asked to deal with our problems.

He will have a great deal to say about the nature of the 92nd Congress.

Now those are not the kinds of decisions one wants to leave to a man whose closest advisers include Strom Thurmond.

But we are faced, now that the election has passed, with being ruled by a man who was not the choice of 90 per cent of us, with being ruled by a man who has yet to demonstrate that he has any concern for the poor or the black. We will be ruled by a man who says he wants to rebuild our slums with black capitalism, which can only mean exchanging the race of the people who have been exploiting us. Faced with that kind of government over the next four years, the way that all of us act from now until 1972 is going to be very important.

We face these next four years a Congress that is more conservative than the last one, and we face a nation that has grown tired of the demands of the black and the poor. We are in a position worse off, relatively speaking, than our position has been over the past several years.

You all know the statistics that show more black people working, more living in decent homes, more getting an education, more earning more money. There is another set of figures that shows we make less money now—more in comparison with what we used to make, but less in comparison with white people. We are moving out of poverty, but while white poverty in America has decreased 27 per cent, black poverty has decreased only 3 per cent.

The most frightening figure is this one. The infant mortality rate for blacks—compared with whites—in 1940, 28 years ago, was 70 per cent higher. In other words, our babies died 70 per cent faster 28 years ago than white babies did. There has been some change, however—in 1962, just six short years ago, the figure was 90 per cent.

Now in addition to these kinds of problems, we face involvement in a problem of national proportions, a problem that affects every American, black and white. That problem is America's imperial war in Vietnam. The difference, black and white, is that it affects us more.

It feeds on our community. It takes our sons and fathers and brothers and uncles to fight and die in it in greater proportion than it takes any other group of Americans. Is that because we are braver, or because we love fighting more than anyone else, or because we are greater patriots? I think not. I think it is because young black men find the Army uniform and three square meals a day more attractive than they find life in Harlem, or Watts, or the Delta of Mississippi or the bayous of Louisiana. And so the war takes them. It sends them 8,000 miles away from their homes, telling them they are defending freedom, the kind of freedom they often find lacking in the communities they leave behind.

The war places many of them in an integrated situation for the first time—a front-line foxhole, next to some white boy. America has not yet discovered how to get that kind of integration at home.

Most of us are spectators to the war. We watch the young black man and the white boy on television, often in living color, as they burn down the huts of some poor Vietnamese village, and realize the two of them could not live on the same block in most American villages. We may realize further that if the young black boy is lucky enough to survive the war without being killed, he may come home and may become so frustrated at the discrimination and racism he meets in the land of his birth that he may burn down some American village—using, of course, the skills and the techniques he learned while defending America's freedom overseas.

Now I have heard some black politicians say that the war didn't affect them, that it was a foreign policy matter, and that we ought not say anything about it, that it wasn't our business. Well, let me say that any time you live in a country that is willing to pay $500,000 for every enemy soldier it kills, and only $50.75 for every poor person in the war on poverty, then that is your business.

Every time you find yourself living in a country that tells you violence is all right when it results in death and destruction for some little brown people 8,000 miles away but not when it is done by black people here at home, then it is your business.

Every time your government tells you that the trouble in Vietnam is caused by outside agitators from the North, think back to George Wallace and Marvin Griffin telling you that you would be happy and satisfied if it wasn't for the outside agitators from the American North.

Ladies and gentlemen, it is everyone's business.

So we have to make it our business to tackle some of the evils of 20th Century Americanism—racism and militarism. We could begin to do that by making our own communities strong and by controlling the goods and services and the institutions of our communities. For a long time we've only had the church. That was the only thing that was ours and ours alone. But I hope in the future that we'll begin to widen our sights and say to ourselves that if it operates in a community of black people, black people have got to control it. That means the businesses and it means the schools and it may mean the police as well.

I was in New York City on Monday, and I went to Intermediate School No. 201, one of the Harlem schools that is controlled and run by the people of Harlem. I spoke to a class of eighth graders, and in my speech, I mentioned some great people who have come from Georgia; and with Roy Hamilton and Ray Charles and James Brown and Otis Redding and Gladys Knight and the Pips, I mentioned the Honorable Elijah Muhammad. Now you may not think that eighth graders ought to be taught about Ray Charles or James Brown, and I'd agree with you; and you might think that Elijah Muhammad might not be a proper subject for an eighth grade class either, but they knew who he was. One eighth-grader told me, "Elijah Muhammed taught racist doctrines, and that's why Malcolm X left the Muslims." Another told me, "The Honorable Elijah Muhammad is the leader of the Nation of Islam and the Messenger of Allah."

Now I submit to you, that's a wonderful thing. Not that one child agrees with Mr. Muhammad and another does not, but that both know about him, and both know he is a part of our peculiar history in the United States. That, I think, is what it means when black people control their community.

Additionally, I think we've got to be aware of and suspicious of attempts to turn us against our own interests. Take Mr. Nixon's Black Capitalism, for instance. (Now before any one of you begins to think I'm against capitalism, let me correct you. But I think we'd all admit that if it had not been for white capitalism, none of us would ever have been sold into slavery.) As Mr. Nixon explains it, Black Capitalism means that General Motors will be given tax credits to come into my community to set up a factory that will hire and train black people. Now that is wonderful, but it's not Black Capitalism by any stretch of the imagination. That is white capitalism once again coming into the black community and taking the only thing we have to offer, which is our labor.

Instead, we ought to become interested in—now here's a terrible, dirty word—community socialism. We ought to be interested in the kind of economic development in our communities that will not only give us jobs but will give the community the profit as well. A minister in Philadelphia, the Rev. Leon Sullivan, the man who began the idea that became Operation Breadbasket, has a project like that working now. Mr. Nixon has seen it, and we ought to hope that he gets the message.

We are additionally going to have to look around us for the kinds of people we can join forces with. It would be nice if we could go it alone. I am sure there is not a single person here who hasn't said to himself, at one time or another, I wish I could just get away from all this. But we can't, and our numbers are so small nationally that we have got to find the kinds of people who can help us. Those we used to depend on have deserted us.

Organized labor used to call itself our friend, but you saw where labor was in the 1968 presidential election.

White liberals and moderates used to help us, but this terrible war has attracted nearly all their attention.

So we have got to try to find new friends, while we hope the old ones will come home. We naturally ought to look to the other colored minorities—the Mexican-Americans and the Puerto Ricans and the American Indians. If we could get some kind, any kind of response from the heavy shield of racism that blinds poor white people, they would be our natural allies too.

In the future, we will have to beware of the kinds of coalitions like the one that has existed in this city for so long. That coalition put all of us together with some of the white people—the moderates and the liberals. It worked out fine while it was intended to maintain order; but since the blacks began to demand justice, the coalition is beginning to show some signs of wear. And now they want to expand the city limits to cut our numbers down.

So we have to always be on the lookout for any other forces in American political society that can help us. We ought not to turn anyone down. If your house is on fire, and a man runs up with a bucket of water, don't ask him where he got it or who he is. Just make sure it's not gasoline and then pour it on.

Finally, although we need fast action, we have to move with care. We are living in strange times. For the first time in the last eight years, the forces of conservatism have won a national election. For the first time since 1948, we have had a presidential candidate who appealed to racism. This year the hillbilly Hitler from Alabama won nine million votes. In 1972 he will be back again, and we must be ready for him.

We live in an era in which the next Vice-President of the United States makes jokes about Polacks and Japs—you know that any man who does that will also joke about Wops and Spics and Niggers. We live in an era in which a committee of the U.S. House of Representatives has said we ought to reopen the concentration camps that the Japanese were put in during the Second World War; but this time they don't want to put the Japanese in them, they intend them for us.

In an era like that, we ought to consider that an attack on one of us is really an attack on all of us.

We ought to remember what a German minister had to say when someone asked him what he did to stop Hitler from coming to power. He said: "When they came for the Jews, I did not cry out because I was not a Jew. When they came for the Catholics, I did not cry out because I was not a Catholic. When they came for the union leaders, I did not cry out because I was not a union leader. But when they knocked on my door, then and only then did I think of screaming; but there was no one around to hear my screams."

In closing, let me say one final thing. I have believed that we are and will be a great people because we come from a great people. We have great heroes. But a people with a limited view of their own past will have a limited future. So let me close by reading to you two short pieces that come from our past. One comes from a man who was, I believe, our greatest hero, Frederick Douglass. His words of 100 years ago ought still apply to us today. One comes from a man like us, a black politician, who was thrown out of the Georgia House of Representatives 100 years ago.

Frederick Douglass:

> "He who would be free must strike the first blow. You know that liberty given is never so precious as liberty sought for and fought for. The man who is outraged is the man who must make the first outcry. Depend on it: men will not care much for a people who do not care for themselves. Men will organize to prevent cruelty to animals, for they are dumb creatures and cannot speak for themselves; but we are men, and men must speak for themselves or we shall not be spoken for at all. We hold it self-evident that no class or color should be the exclusive ruler of this country. If there is such a ruling class, there must, of course, be a subject class; and when that condition is established, the government of the people, by the people and for the people shall perish from the earth."

Henry McNeill Turner.

"Even though we are not white, we have accomplished much. We have pioneered a civilization. We have built up your country. We have worked in your field and have garnered your harvest for 250 years. Do we ask for compensation for the sweat our fathers bore for you—for the tears you have caused, the hearts you have broken and the blood you have spilled? Do we ask retaliation? We ask it not. We are willing to let the dead past bury the dead. But we ask you now for our rights. You have all the elements of superiority on your side—you have our money and your own, you have our education and your own. You have our land and your own. We are strangers in the land of our birth; without money, without education, without aid, without a rook to cover us while we live, nor clay to cover us when we die. It is extraordinary that a race such as yours, professing gallantry and chivalry and education and superiority, living in a land where Bibles are read and where Gospel truths are spoken and where courts of justice are presumed to exist—it is extraordinary that with all these advantages on your side, you can still make war on the defenseless black man.

"The great question is this: Am I a man? If I am such, I claim the rights of man. You may expel us, but I believe firmly that one day you will repent it. The black man cannot protect a country if the country cannot protect him, and if tomorrow, a war would arise, I would not raise a musket to defend a country where my manhood is denied. The fashionable way in Georgia is for the white man to sit at ease while the black man does the work, but I will say this much to the colored men of Georgia: never lift a finger or raise a hand in defense of Georgia unless Georgia acknowledges that you are men and invests you with the rights pertaining to manhood. You may expel us by your votes today; but while you do it, remember that there is a just God in Heaven, whose all-seeing eye beholds alike the acts of the oppressor and the oppressed, and who despite the machinations of the wicked, never fails to vindicate the cause of justice and the sanctity of his own handiwork."

Let me suggest that those two men were men, real men. Their words are 100 years old, but their thoughts and ideas are as fresh as tomorrow. If each of us can approach his job with one half the fire and fervor that those two men did, then we will have vindicated the trust our constituents put in us.

'... The Key to Southern Liberation ...'

Dr. Samuel D. Cook, professor of political science at Duke University, gave "an historical sketch of the Negro in the Southern political process" at the opening session Dec. 12. His talk was followed by a panel-audience discussion. Dr. Cook is chairman of the Voter Education Project's Advisory Committee.

Just as politics "makes strange bedfellows," it begets baffling meanings, events, and experiences. It sometimes makes realities of illusions and illusions of realities. Politics can enslave "the high and the mighty" even as they celebrate the delights of power and privilege. There is a politics of deception, but there are also deceptions of politics, including brutal self-deceptions. The history of Southern politics is a grim reminder and prophetic warning of the perils of politics of fear, negativism, memory, separation, and brutally irrational collective egoism and pride.

The historic position of the Negro in the Southern political system is an awfully strange phenomenon, full of paradox and irony, simplicity and complexity, mystery and meaning, public injustice and poetic justice. Strange as it may seem, the black man's influence on Southern political systems, structures, events, and public policies has been profound, central, and universal. Somehow, the harsh and startling truth is that the Negro is the key to Southern politics. Take him out of the equation and the politics of Southern history does not, in substance, make sense; it is, clearly, beyond the realm of rational intelligibility. Put him in the key role and the tawdry pieces, like a symphony, fall into their proper places and perspectives.

Though, in essence, powerless, helpless, and victimized, the black man, because of the tyranny of racism over the mind of the white South, has been able, without intention or knowledge, to dominate Southern political and governmental life. Essentially outside the political arena, his presence in Dixie largely determined the content, style, rhetoric, direction, and issues inside the Southern political process. How paradoxical and ironic!

Driven by a paranoic fear of black control or "domination," the political thought and practices of the South produced by way of the back door (how symbolic!) that very "black domination" it most feared and sought so desperately to avoid. Slaves tyrannized masters; subjects tyrannized citizens; those who monopolized the structure and process of power fell victim to the very men against whom, above all, their terrible power was directed. Whites fell into the trap they had so cleverly and determinedly made for blacks: absolute dominion.

The very presence of the Negro exercised a dominating influence on the public philosophy and life of the South. The heart of Southern history has been informed and inspired by memories and anticipations, hopes and fears, beliefs and doubts, cocksure complacency and blinding restlessness issuing from the troubling and universal presence of Negroes. Unwittingly, the Negro has exercised tyrannical power over the Southern political process. Just as he was victimized by the albatross of racism, so was the white man. With all his awesome and unlimited power, the white man of the South was powerless—psychologically, emotionally, intellectually, spiritually, culturally, economically, and politically—to shake off the tyrannical influence of the black man. The black man has been the Southern white man's "hang-up." The Negro, like a fearsome ghost, has haunted and driven the white man. The white South's actions and reactions, plans and counter-plans, contemplative flights and manipulative processes were, in large measure, simply echoes and reflections of the agonized, agonizing, and fearsome presence of politically alienated and powerless black men. Deep and irrational fears can enslave even the most powerful. The Southern white man's genius—political and otherwise—has been exhausted in "the race problem." Southern politics is, at bottom, the politics of fear, and the object of fear is the black man.

The changes that have occurred on the Southern political scene—symbolized by your election to positions of power and responsibility—are indeed radical, but the most radical ones are yet to come. The key to Southern liberation is black liberation—liberation from the cancer of racism. When black men are fully free, the South will be fully free. It will overcome its legacy of national alienation, poverty, illiteracy, economic colonialism, cultural and ideological isolation, and tragic and self-defeating enslavement to the tyranny of the past and the seething despair of a collective existence born of entrapment to the paralysis of memory. Freed from the heavy yoke of racism, the South—and, on a deeper level, the nation as well—will take wings.

I. The Nature of Politics

Politics, shorn of its non-essentials, is a struggle for power and for the values associated with, and derived from, the possession of power. Politics, said Max Weber, "means striving to share power or striving to influence the distribution of power, either among states or among groups within a state."[1] Political institutions and activities are, essentially, power relations. Power is the ability to get things done, to influence others, to create the desired consequences or conditions.[2] It is the capacity to manipulate and control the world of men as well as the realm of nature in accordance with one's interests and desires.

"Political power is social power focused on the state. It involves control of other men for the purpose of influencing the behavior of the state, its legislative, administrative and judicial activities."[3] Political power determines the authoritative allocation or distribution of public benefits. It involves public decision-making in terms of form and substance, personnel and policy, input and output, privileges and privations, punishment and reward, protection and exploitation, enrichment and impoverishment. Accordingly, the stakes of politics are indeed high and precious. The political system determines who gets what, when, and how. The fruits of political power are many and varied. Public services—from physical protection to street lighting, sewage and garbage disposal—taxation, opportunities for education, enjoyment, employment and other life chances, and related bread-and-butter decisions are largely political matters. Ultimately, politics has profound bearing on the quality and destiny of human life and culture.

Politics is, therefore, a high and honorable calling. It is no better and no worse than other honorable professions. Because of the nature of their office and responsibilities, what political leaders do, in terms of virtues and defects, successes and failures, devotion to public good and pursuit of self-serving ends, is more glaring, visible, and dramatic than that of most men and women. The public properly expects high standards from politicians. After all, they are supposed to be the servants and guardians of the public interest.

The political system and the people who manage its operations have great responsibilities and opportunities for public service. Conflict and disagreement, owing both to human nature and to the scarcity of goods or objects of satisfaction, are an inherent part of the human scene. Politics is peculiarly the arena of conflict, tension, clash, and competitive pursuit for the satisfaction of desires and the achievement of advantage and privilege. It is an eternal battleground of pressure and counter-pressure, demand and counter-demand, pushing and shoving.

As Miller asserts,

> Politics . . . is about disagreement or conflict; and political activity is that which is intended to bring about or resist change, in the face of possible resistance . . . . Political activity . . . arises out of disagreement, and it is concerned with the use of government to resolve conflict in the direction of change or in the prevention of change. It is about policy and position.[4]

Conflict is at the heart of politics. Herein lies perhaps the most creative power and responsibility of political life. Politics is concerned with the adjustment, regulation, accommodation, management, and resolution of conflict growing out of competitive desires, needs, interests, and preferences. It has been well said that "politics is the most inclusive process by which social conflict is regulated in a community."[5] The quality of the political system and the character of political leaders are best determined by how they deal with conflict. The response of the political system to the stubborn reality, power, and persistence of conflict discloses its viability, character, and worth. A political system is creative or destructive in accordance with the pattern and quality of its response to the basic problems and dimensions of human conflict.

Race, in its many manifestations, has been the chief source and expression of conflict and tension in Southern political life. The response of the political system has been destructive and sterile rather than creative and imaginative. Radically absent were creative encounters and responsible responses. The fundamental dimensions and human realities of the situation were never faced; indeed, a premium was placed on not facing them. Methods of political sidestepping were endlessly elaborated and faithfully implemented. Exclusion, oppression, suppression, and victimization of blacks were the chief methods and techniques of the South in dealing with racial conflict and tension. They prevailed.

Regulation, adjustment, accommodation, and resolution of conflicting interest were accomplished by the ruthless mobilization and brutal application of "White Power." The idea of shared power and mutuality of political respect was totally lacking. Conflict communication, participation, and representation were not only irrelevant; they were viewed as dangerous subversion of law, order, justice, and the common good. Issues, therefore, were never confronted, and hence their resolution was made an obvious impossibility. The system not only fostered but celebrated and glorified collective hypocrisy, conceit, egoism, and dishonesty. Majestic principles were invoked to justify the reduction of black men to the status of subject and victim of the political process. Lip-service was dutifully paid to democracy even as Negroes were systematically excluded from the experience of every element of citizenship.

II. Southern Politics and the Tyranny of Racism

A. Black Men As Subject, Issue, and Victim

To understand the depth and power of racism over the Southern political process, it first is necessary to grasp what politics has meant to the South. In a way unique to America, politics has been dear to the heart of Southerners; they have loved it with a passion. It has been a source of profound meaning, attachment, value and fulfillment. If racism was the South's first love, politics was its second. The Southern love of politics, Cash insisted, is inseparable from its love of rhetoric and oratory.[6]

He went on to say that,

> Thus the politics of the Old South was a theater for the play of the purely personal, the purely romantic, and the purely hedonistic. It was an arena wherein one great champion confronted another or a dozen, and sought to outdo them in rhetoric and splendid gesturing. It swept back the loneliness of the land, it brought men together under torches, it filled them with the contagious power of the crowd, it unleashed emotion and set it leaping and dancing, it caught the very meanest man up out of his own tiny legend into the gorgeous fabric of the legend of this or that great hero.[7]

Besides, politics in the South has been a form of entertainment, relaxation, and escape from the painful burdens of life. All this must be understood in terms of the region's legacy of poverty, misery, illiteracy, disease, national alienation, and tragedy. Politics has been precious to the Southern collective experience.

Politics provided a psychological and emotional outlet from the soil, which was both a prison and a shrine, a curse and a blessing.

Atlanta Constitution columnist Celestine Sibley perceived the heart of matter:

> If there had been anywhere else to go, any other form of public entertainment, it's possible the rural Southerner wouldn't have developed such a marked taste for oratory and barbecue. Having little enough to divert them, however, at 'lay-by time,' when there was nothing to do in the fields except let the crops grow, and the summer protracted meeting had run its course, a political rally at the county seat was a welcome event. Men of all ages from bearded grandpas to shirt-tail boys saddled up horses, hitched the mule to the wagon or set out afoot to hear such spellbinders as fiery Bob Toombs, Little Alec Stephens, Tom Watson and, in later years, Ol' Gene Talmadge . . . . You have but to read some of the old speeches to realize that politics . . . was better than any road show.[8]

No wonder the South produced so many colorful political figures. One thinks of "Kingfish" Huey Long—"Every Man a King"; "Ma" Ferguson—elected governor to serve as proxy for her husband, barred from office by an earlier impeachment and indictment; Ol' Gene Talmadge—displaying his red galluses, appealing to the "wool-hat" boys, and insisting that he didn't want any votes from any county big enough to have street car tracks; "Kissing Big Jim" Folsom; Georgia's two or three governors at the same time; Cotton Ed Smith discoursing with great eloquence on the virtues of Southern womanhood; Lester Maddox, in the early days of his campaign for the governorship, proclaiming his opposition to school consolidation on the ground that it would prevent some nice little girl from being chosen school queen; George Wallace standing in the "schoolhouse door" in symbolic defiance of the whole majesty and power of the United States government. Behind all the comedy was a serious commitment to political life. It satisfied deep needs.

"The South has always been a great land for politicians. This isn't mere happen-so. It results from the character of the people and the nature of their life."[9] Politics in the Old South was something sacred, something of a religion, perhaps a substitute for, or an extension of, religious experience, rituals, and symbols. The South, according to Dabbs, "tended to replace religion with politics, and to make politics, religion, and the moral life one."[10] He goes on to speak of the "Southern tendency to keep questions in the political realm and to prevent them from becoming moral and religious."[11]

Accordingly, the oppressed status of the Negro in Southern political life represented his victimization and exploitation by something precious and sacred to white Southerners. Deep beliefs and commitments were involved. The region's first and second loves were united in political and governmental institutions and processes to the detriment of black humanity. Politics was, "so to speak," said Cash, "the temple wherein men entered to participate in the mysteries of the common brotherhood of white men, to partake of the holy sacrament of Southern loyalty and hate."[12] Thus racist demagogues, with all their oratory and manipulative skill and power, provided to whites not only enjoyment and entertainment but enrichment, satisfaction, meaning, and fulfillment at the heavy expense of black men. Negroes were excluded from, and victimized by, the Southern political process with a passion that partook of the "sacred."

The raping of Negroes by the Southern political process was, therefore, born of and nurtured by the search for meaning as well as the will-to-power. There was, in fact, a marriage of the will-to-meaning and the will-to-power. Psychological and spiritual components combined. The domination and control of black men satisfied not only the egoistic ambitions, imperialistic aims, and aggressive inclinations of whites; they also satisfied certain spiritual and moral impulses as well. It may sound strange, but the white South gave the political process a moral, spiritual, and religious interpretation. It was also viewed as a commanding agency of organic social cohesion and unity. The Negro was caught up in the throes of a variety of convergent forces and values. A racist public order issued from, and pointed to, more fundamental concerns of the moral, social and religious sphere. The intensity, persistence, and evangelical character of the political persecution of black Southerners is beyond rational comprehension unless linked to perception of certain ultimate concerns.

A broad perspective is essential in order to understand the constant preoccupation with the presence of the Negro and the expenditure of endless energy as well as moral, rational, and political resources to keep him in a state of oppression. The South felt it necessary to make the alienation and domination of Negroes absolute and total—and even that did not produce satisfaction. The desire for security against a weak and black minority was insatiable; the hunger and thirst were beyond satisfaction. It was not enough to make black men powerless; they had to be humiliated and consistently and brutally reminded, in the public forum and in the boondocks, of the contempt and scorn in which they were held. They were easy targets and victims of political evangelism, and the peril of their presence had to be denounced with fervor and earnest dedication.

What's more, the white South could never shake off the feeling of the mysterious and perilous presence of the Negro. Serious threat of "black domination" was always lurking in the background. Negro strength would, according to the perceptions and fears of whites, somehow break through the stone walls and steel barriers of oppressive laws, caste, and custom. Danger was omnipresent; black invasion of sacred white temples was always an immediate possibility. Watching had to be constant; new walls of protection had to be built; new devices for the detection of rebellion had to be invented.

There was, on the ultimate level, a feeling of the powerlessness of power to prevent attempts at social and political change. Prevalent was the paranoic syndrome of a secret but powerful conspiracy against the Southern "way of life." The white man never felt secure. He was haunted by an inner doubt and fear that he had not done enough to maintain the political enslavement of the black man. Complete disfranchisement of blacks did not bring serenity and confidence to whites. Doubt still lurked. Black men were still viewed as a threat, a problem, a nightmare.

Perhaps subconsciously, the feeling that the Negro would rise was substituted for the sorry myth that the Confederate South would rise again. It is strange, but power does not necessarily produce security, and absolute power, if it were possible, would not inevitably bring about absolute security. Ironically, black men, in their powerlessness, exercised tremendous power over whites, who monopolized the process and substance of power; relegated to subjects, black men informed and inspired the basic political philosophy and practices of white citizens. There is an element of mystery in all this, but there is also a core of meaning.

Southern politics has been primarily the politics of race. Racism has presided over perhaps every major aspect of the political life of the region, if the situation is viewed in large terms—in the pre-Civil War era, the Civil War itself, the Confederacy, the Democratic split in 1860, Reconstruction, the Redemption, the establishment of various restrictive voting laws, the Black Codes, the rise and perpetuation of the one-party system,[13] the birth and death of Populism,[14] the Dixiecrat movement, the numerous independent electors exercises, the Wallace movement, and so forth. Alexander Heard asserts, "Southern concern over the Negro is the most deeply rooted source of political contention in American politics."[15]

In his classic study, Southern Politics, V. O. Key observed:

> In its grand outlines the politics of the South revolves around the position of the Negro. It is at times interpreted as a politics of cotton, a politics of free trade, as a politics of agrarian poverty, or as a politics of planter, and plutocrat. Although such interpretations have a superficial validity, in the last analysis the major peculiarities of Southern politics go back to the Negro. Whatever phase of the Southern political process one seeks to understand, sooner or later the trail of inquiry leads to the Negro.[16]

The "Southern bloc" in the Congress exists only in reference to the race issue. After analyzing Southern voting behavior in the Senate, Key concluded that "on the race question, and on that question alone, does a genuine Southern solidarity exist. On other questions Southern Democrats split and Southern solidarity becomes a matter of degree." [17] After examining Southern voting behavior in the House, Key concluded: "Thus the inference to be drawn from House behavior is similar to that deductible from Senate voting: Southern attitude toward the Negro provides the bedrock of Southern sectionalism."[18] The celebrated Southern doctrine of states' rights—from its initial formulation to the present—is, at bottom, an ideological weapon, political imperative, and respectable camouflage for a free hand in the management of race relations. It has no consistent and meaningful application elsewhere. The South "has not stood consistently for states-rights, except on issues associated with slavery and the Negro question."[19]

Somehow, then, the Negro has, unwittingly, exercised a curious tyranny over the mind of the white South. Of the centrality and universality of Negro influence, it has been well said that the > fundamental determinant of Southernism has been the presence of the Negro in large numbers relative to the whites, and resulting white supremacy doctrines and patterns of behavior. A South divorced from the problem of race would not have been a Solid South; a South preoccupied with race problems became a Solid South.[20]

It is of timely relevance to note that racism, fearing that, in a system of competitive party politics Negroes would hold the balance of power, is chiefly responsible for the historic one-party system in the South. "The South is a one-party area," commented Rossiter nearly a decade ago, "primarily because of the Negro."[21] Perhaps the crowning irony of Southern political history and process is that the party of Lincoln—which, owing to its image of association with the rights and aspirations of Negroes, was for nearly a century reduced to impotence in the South—must attribute a large part, though, of course, not all, of its modern rebirth and success to racism.[22]

Significantly, the pervasive influence of the Negro on the political process of the South has not been as a political agent and participant but as a political issue and object.[23] It has been, in other words, his function as a subject, not citizen. Essentially outside the political process and system, the Negro has been the chief source of animation, dynamism, inspiration, strategy, style, issues, and direction.[24] Southern politicization and political socialization issued from, in large measure, the very presence of the black man. The heart of Southern political socialization is the proposition that the governing process is the business of whites only. The Negro, in this view, is only subject—not citizen; a tool to be manipulated, not a political agent to be reckoned with and whose demands are to be responded to. "A democratic citizen," it has been well said, "speaks the language of demands."[25]

B. Consequences of the Tyranny of Racism on Southern Politics

Owing to the tyranny of racism, the Southern political system and process have been built on exclusivist rather than inclusivist principles and ideals. Interpretations of democracy, equality, justice, progress, and other moral ideals that inspire and inform the Southern political process were provincial and made in a manner to deny that very exclusiveness. The principles of democracy, in this framework, were not violated but, on the contrary, affirmed and institutionalized with religious fidelity. As Louis Hartz observed, "One of the crucial factors in the solidarity of the South was a democratic spirit enhanced by the slavery on which it rested."[26]

Some spokesmen of the Old South saw in Greek democracy their model and inspiration. Democracy for whites only was idealized. "The dominance of all white men over the Negro created a sense of brotherhood not unlike the Greek concept of democracy."[27] But even as Athens was invoked, fidelity to the American Creed was proclaimed. "The proslavery argument was so cleverly combined with American ideals that servitude appeared the very condition of democracy."[28] The very slavery of blacks was viewed as a basis of the freedom, equality , citizenship, culture, civilization, and humanity of whites.[29]

Ante-bellum political philosophy, attitudes, public policy, and vision have been continuous and productive of some awesome fruits. The Old South mothered the legacy that whites are born to rule and Negroes to obey, that the governing process is the business alone of whites. Because of slavery, said Tocqueville, "the citizen of the Southern states becomes a sort of domestic dictator from infancy; the first notion he acquires in life is that he is born to command, and the first habit which he contracts is that of ruling without resistance."[30] The operation of the particularistic version of democracy spawned an institutionalized negation of the ideal of the universality of participation inherent in the democratic process. It has meant not only the total alienation of Negroes from, but, even worse, their victimization and exploitation by, the Southern political process.

Down through the years, Southern public life has adhered to the principle of racist exclusivity. Even progressive and reform movements, weak at best, have espoused the ideology of racism. In his monumental Origins of the New South, C. Vann Woodward has a chapter whose title is: "Progressivism—For Whites Only." He maintains, "Southern progressivism generally was progressivism for white men only," and notes the "paradoxical combination of white supremacy and pregressivism."[31]

Self-defeating for whites have been the consequences of the centrality of racism in the total political culture. If it emasculated blacks, it produced the sterility of whites. Low electoral and other forms of citizen participation, a one-party system, (or, rather, a no-party system), a primitive political culture, diversion of energies and imagination from the real and vital issues of regional growth and development, alienation from the mainstream of the public life of the nation, vast restrictions on freedom of choice, archaic political, governmental, and constitutional structures, fertile soil for demagogues, tragic illusions, romance with negativism, and wild-eyed and futile adventures, and an inability to perceive the ultimate dignity, vitality and creative and higher possibilities of political life are all, in great measure, the product of racist-dominated politics. Great visions have been vitiated and buried because of racism. There is deep pathos here. The "tragedy of the South," says Dean Acheson, "has been that racism has corrupted an otherwise respectable strain of protest and experimentation in the search for economic equality, dating back to Jefferson, Mason, Randolph, and Jackson."[32]

Worthy of emphasis is the low level of electoral participation. Voting is only one aspect of political consciousness and involvement, but it is crucial. The record of the whole country is a terrible commentary on our public life,[33] but the South's record is the most depressing.[34] "By any standard," said Key, "precious few Southerners exercise the rights of citizens in a democracy."[35] Many reasons may be adduced, but they are all related, in the end, perhaps, to the "Negro problem."[36] Restrictions on Negro suffrage were vast and constituted "the most impressive systems of obstacles between the voter and the ballot box known to the democratic world."[37]

But restrictions on Negro suffrage took their toll on whites as well, both directly and indirectly, resulting in a small segment of the white population monopolizing the governing process. Indirect limitations on white voters flowed from the quality of the whole political system—the lack of competitive politics, the absence of issues and choices beyond personalities and self-serving factions, the hegemony of routine, and the sheer weight of the cumbersome mechanics of registration and voting. Direct restrictions on whites proceeded from laws aimed at Negroes but also militated against whites of low socio-economic and educational background and status. Laws directed against Negroes almost invariably affected some white voters.[38] The poll tax, for example, Key held, "insofar as it has deterred voting, has operated primarily to keep whites away from the polls,"[39] because Negroes could be kept from the polls by other means. Besides, the landed aristocrats and Bourbons held no special love for "poor whites." Thus, ironically, in the Southern political system certain whites have been victimized by the mythology and practice of the politics of white supremacy. In fact, "in sheer quantity nonvoting whites outnumber the voteless Negroes of the South as a whole."[40] In terms of substantive public policy, the region's legacy of poverty, low per capita income, disease, illiteracy, and undevelopment of resources—human and natural—is a pathetic reminder of the depth and persistence of human folly. In every major crisis of the South, its leadership has defaulted. It has misled.

III. The Day and Night of Reconstruction

With legal emancipation and ratification of the Civil War amendments, the hope and expectation prevailed that former slaves would become, in reality as well as in theory, citizens and therefore full and equal participants in the Southern political process. Hopes, among the four million freedmen and their friends and allies, soared. Expectations and aspirations took wing. Reconstruction got under way.

Obviously, the new freedmen had no political experience or civic education. What is less well-known—and this tells us much about the character of the whole American political tradition as regards black men—is that even free Negroes, before the Civil War, had been, on the whole systematically excluded from the processes of politics. "Prior to the Civil War, Negroes had the right to vote in only four Northern states—Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New York, and Vermont. One Southern state, North Carolina, for a period allowed freed slaves to vote."[40] The voting laws of New York had discriminated against free Negroes.[41] When the Fifteenth Amendment was ratified in 1870, Negroes could vote in only seven Northern states.[42] "During the period between the Philadelphia conventions of 1787 and 1865, only Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts permitted Negroes to vote on equal terms with whites. All others, at some time, have barred Negro Americans from the suffrage."[43]

Despite the tragically scarred legacy of slavery, Southern resentment and hostility, political chaos, and partisan wrangling for the advantages of power and privilege, Negroes plunged deeply into the muddy waters of Southern politics. They registered and voted in large numbers. They filled significant elective and appointive offices. They were familiar figures at state constitutional conventions, in state legislatures, and in local positions of responsibility. Between 1869 and 1880, 16 black men served in Congress from the South—two of whom, Hiram R. Revels and Blanche K. Bruce, represented Mississippi in the Senate. By 1895, 21 Negroes, representing eight states, had served in the House of Representatives.

Many myths have been created and perpetuated about "Negro domination" during Reconstruction—powerful myths that have been used to justify the political oppression and degradation of black men. The facts, however, are quite different. As John Hope Franklin observed,

> No group has attracted more attention or has had its role more misrepresented by contemporaries and by posterity than Southern Negroes during Radical Reconstruction. The period has been described as one of Negro rule, as one of gross perfidy with the Negro as the central figure, since the reins of misgovernment were supposedly held by black militiamen. Negroes were not in control of the state governments at any time anywhere in the South. They held public office and, at times, played important parts in the public life of their respective states. But it would be stretching a point to say that their roles were dominant, and it would be hopelessly distorting the picture to suggest that they ruled the South. It was in South Carolina that they had the greatest numerical strength. In the first legislature there were eighty-seven Negroes and forty whites. From the outset, however, whites controlled the state senate and in 1874 the lower house as well. At all times the governor was white. There were two Negro lieutenant governors. . . .[44]

Negro public officials, during Reconstruction, were neither better nor worse than their white counterparts. Both virtues and defects, both successes and failures were shared. Black men made real contributions.[45] A major contribution was to the establishment of public education for both races. "It is fair to say," asserted DuBois, "that the Negro carpetbag governments established the public schools of the South."[46]

The hopes of Reconstruction were dashed for a variety of reasons. The failure of the national government to enforce the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, partisan calculations, Southern determination to make the political process the exclusive prerogative of whites, the low economic, social, and educational status of blacks and other forces conspired to end the experiment in shared power and responsibility. With the withdrawal of federal troops, the Negro was abandoned to his enemies. White power was restored with vengeance. Force, violence, economic pressure, psychological coercion, and various "legal" devices were employed to reduce black men, once more, to the status of subject and victim. Virtual slavery returned.

IV. Conclusion: Citizen at Last?

"The citizen, unlike the subject, is an active participant in the political input process—the process by which political decisions are made."[47] Is the Negro, at long last, a free, equal participant in the Southern political process? The answer is clearly in the negative. The input must be increased; the output even more so. Changes in public philosophy and policy must come.

While it is true that the Negro still is part subject, it is also true that, because of numerous changes in the political landscape, he is much nearer the shore of political equality than at any previous time. He now has a toehold in the Southern political process. He can, on the whole, vote. Negroes are, in increasing numbers, elected to public office. A handful hold appointive positions in state and local governments. Black men are beginning to participate in the conduct of party affairs. A new day has dawned in the political and governmental life of the region. Because of pressure, barriers continue to fall. Because of increased participation, black men are developing a fund of public experience and increasing their political confidence and skill.

Negroes can help redeem the past of the Southern political process. They can be liberating and redemptive agents. Just as the Negro was the key to Southern political enslavement, he is the key to Southern political emancipation. The Southern genius has been exhausted in the "race problem." Black men, working with whites of reason, good will, and a sense of justice, can largely free the South from the chains and illusions of the past. The chief problem is racism.

Freed from the prison of racism, the South will be freed from the heavy yoke of deceit, hypocrisy, negativism, obstructionism, and provincialism. It will be freed from the vain illusion of the possibility of the restoration of a public order "gone with the wind." It will be freed of the exhausting and painful efforts to maintain a closed corporation. It will be freed from enslavement to the past and to memory. Freed of the Atlas burden of racism, the Southern political process will be able to say, ironically, with Martin Luther King: "Free at last."

'...Real Kind of Revolution...'

Dr. Vivian Henderson, president of Clark College in Atlanta, was luncheon speaker Dec. 12th. Dr. Henderson is author of a Southern Regional Council study on "The Economic Status of Negroes" and is co-author of several books, including "The Advancing South: Manpower Prospects and Problems" and "Jobs and Color: Negro Employment in Tennessee State Government." He is a member of the VEP Advisory Committee and the SRC executive committee.

I am interested in discussing with you what I believe to be a very important set of background phenomena in terms of the South. This audience, by virtue of its structure and the structure of its agenda and its program, obviously is interested in the South. Subsequently I'd like to try to pinpoint some kind of strategy for black elected officials.

Now I won't be too successful here, because I'm not a political scientist and I'm not a political figure. But I've had some experience in the practical field of trying to arouse a community and particularly to help organize Negro political groups for the purpose of effecting a sophisticated kind of strategy (I use the word sophistication without apology here.)—a sophisticated kind of strategy that would enable us to know something about what we ought to do under a variety of conditions involving political participation.

We hear a lot of talk about the revolutions of today. And, of course, to me, when we talk in terms of revolution, we think in terms of violence, physical upheaval—and of course there is some of that. But I think the politics of the South and certainly the representation here today manifests the real kind of revolution that is going on in this country and particularly in the South.

Any person with minimum intelligence would sense the fact that what is here today would not have been here three years ago. Any person with minimum intelligence would recognize the fact that what we have here is a conglomeration of personalities from varying black groups representing different kinds of interests but all currently having one thing in common—and that is, being black and, at the same time, trying to pursue, like a people, the best life and the good life within the framework of a democratic society. It is this kind of a revolution that doesn't get enough attention in the public press and in the media. It is usually the soapbox orator who gets the attention.

The issues facing the South today emerged from traditional and persistent problems. This is so with regard to race relations, and it is also the case with regard to the broader of politics—of economics, education and leadership. On the other hand, I do think that the forces which condition and shape these issues are of recent vintage. The forces of urbanization, the forces of technological change, mobility of labor and capital and the swiftness with which such forces play havoc with the lives of many people—this is certainly of a new origin.

As Southerners and as people interested in working in Southern politics, it is important for us to recognize the two faces of the South. The concept of the old order —the only face the South exhibited—was that of a rural and backward South. Now I see that there are at least two faces today. One is the face of Southern cities and metropolitan areas, smaller towns with an urban mentality—plagued, to be sure, with the systems and traditional problems and images, but trying to carry the South into the mainstream of American and rural life, and yet encumbered with problems ushered in by the forces of urbanization and technological change. This is the face that we recognize. This is the face that is represented here in this conference—a face of black men and women struggling to emancipate the region from its traditional backwardness and its traditional images. One gentleman from Portsmouth, Va., last night said to me that the South will rise again, but it will be rising with the leadership of black people and rising with a new kind of image and not in terms of the old kind of image.

But we can not suggest that with all the progress that apparently is being made that there is a continuance of that second face. And that is of the old order—the face of racism, segregation, discrimination, anti-unionism, down with the federal government, preservation of the status quo, agrarianism, and a Communist under every rock and stone. It is the face of rural-dominated legislatures, ultra-conservative representatives in the U. S. Congress, low-wage industry, the faces of George Wallace and Lester Maddox, and the faces of hungry children and poverty as established by recent reports. These are the forces or the issues that black elected officials must recognize.

At the same time I recognize the fact that many of America's problems today are not regional in character.

Certainly they do not carry the regional thrust of a few years ago.

We know, for example, that the South's problems, like the nation's problems, are basically urban problems. Only a few years ago the South's problems were mostly rural, and those of the rest of the nation were basically urban. Race relations problems were a few years ago confined to the South because overwhelming proportions of black Americans lived in the South. But today the problems of Southern job-seekers, income recipients, housing tenants, school children, the problems of those who pursue welfare rights and quality education, the problems of those who seek health improvement and relief from hunger and malnutrition—they have only limited differences in the South than those Americans in other regions.

The solutions certainly have lost some of their regional character. Since World War II Southern progress economically, politically and socially and in race relations has been directly tied to national programs, national policy and national trends. It is for this reason that I question the whole concept of grants to states and the whole concept of the reversal to states' rights. Recent economic gains in the South and improvements in employment and so forth, these have been directly tied to the national force of economic and political power.

It may appear irrelevant for a conference of this sort to deal with problems of people in the South in a regional context at this point in our history. But the South does have problems peculiar to the region. Its politics, its economics, its race relations and its history—these are all peculiar to the region.

One of the great differences between the South and other regions today is what I believe to be a realistic kind of opportunity—an opportunity for the South, even at this late hour, to avoid the mistakes of the North in favor of building up in its society a generating force of participation by all its citizens. To me this is the great significance of the conference here today. One of the great challenges to black elected officials is recognition of a role that the Negro elected official must play in building up a society capitalizing upon the fact that there may be an opportunity here for the South not to make the mistake of the North and build into rigidity a housing segregation, etc. that the North is plagued with today.

While the South's history is laden with scars of demogogic politics—agrarianism, demeaning race relations and a history of the severest kinds of racial dualism and hate—it is also a history of black and white poverty existing side-by-side and a peculiarity of less-than-rigid distribution of population by race, within cities and within rural areas. Strange as it may seem, the data will suggest that urbanization, for example, has not developed in the South as it has in other regions. In spite of the farm mechanization and the displacement of many people from farms by farm mechanization, the technology is still relatively novel in its impact on Southern non-agricultural industry.

We began by talking about the region, the place that's being represented here. It has made several strides in the areas of unemployment, per capita income and the like. It has made great strides in the area of politics. (As I understand, there are 385 black elected officials in the states that represented the Old Confederacy, the highest degree of concentration of legally elected public officials than anywhere else in the nation. I would say we need more. The most important thing is for the black elected officials who are in office today to recognize this goal and help to get others to be a part of this participation.) There are several things that have influenced this kind of progress. One has been the development of national policy to promote full employment to combat poverty, and so forth. Two, the part of national policy to combat racial discrimination and segregation through schools and hospitals and employment and voter registration and voting.

It's on this second point that I am concerned. I have yet to see in the South, in spite of the positions of our black elected officials, the kind of initiation of public policy legislation which really brings the problem and the solution from the national level to some of our local and state levels. It seems to me that we have just about gotten what we are going to get from national policy; and if the Cabinet that was appointed last night is any criteria, then I'm quite sure that we have gotten just about all we are going to get for the next few years. It means, in other words, that rather than being passive as elected officials and responding and reacting to legislation introduced by others, the great challenge we have for the black elected officials today is to take the initiative and introduce this legislation formulating the public policy, pushing it, riding it, and making these policies known to their constituents.

Number three is the forces of the redistribution of the Negro population. Now these and other kinds of things and work will continue to influence public change and they will continue to influence public employment.

Now let me just mention one thing here which I think is extraordinarily important and which I think we live with every day and which I think is the kind of a thing which we can get our hands on pretty quickly in terms of effecting public policy for ourselves. I mentioned population redistribution. I also mentioned that the South has had what I call less-than-rigid distribution of the population by race, particularly when it comes to housing. Now I didn't say there was no segregation in housing—I didn't say that. I simply said it was less than rigid. This is a very serious problem. Local, regional political leadership must deal with it. Now cities like Houston with its third ward and fifth ward, Atlanta with its Southwest section—these have long had rather rigid housing segregation. But most Southern rural towns and rural areas and urban areas have not been rigid in this respect.

Through urban renewal and construction of new expressways, more and more citizens now in the South have built—have in fact planned and engineered development of—racial ghettos and race lines in terms of housing and citizenry. The negative aspects of this passage, in my judgment, will far outweigh any positive impact that has been proved. Consequently, whereas school desegregation could have been dealt with as easy to come by in many areas of the South, insofar as residential patterns were concerned, it is more and more repeated by concentration of public housing, housing developments and single-family dwellings in racial enclaves and racial ghettos. Any elected official who sits up and watches this go by without trying to do something relative to it has missed the boat, and I believe this is only one example of the kind of problem we face in urban circles and in smaller rural farms. And to it black elected officials must address themselves.

Negroes are going to continue to move to the urban areas. It is projected that by 1975, 72 per cent of the Southern brothers and sisters will be in urban cities and towns.

The rise of racial ghettos in the Southern region should be a matter of concern to all of us. And yet I recognize that two parts of this most of us have been able to capitalize on on one hand—and how it hurts us on the other hand. For example, many of you here would not have been elected to public office had it not been for the racial ghetto. And I recognize the power of politics within the racial ghetto. This is an educated kind of opportunity. It presents a greater kind of opportunity for greater political participation. And indeed it represents perhaps a new kind of opportunity for political leadership in our cities, including mayors of cities and towns. But it also means on the positive side the things that black elected officials recognize as the cities become more concentrated with the brothers and sisters: that the problems of poverty and progress are mounting. We must understand that issues will become more important to the brothers and sisters than personality. This will become more important then to the black constituency as they feel the pressures that must accompany the higher degree of concentration of people in a small area.

In sum, at this point what I'm trying to say is that we in this region know the South has made a lot of gains, and they've made them on all sides. Then we know that civil rights gains have benefitted all black Americans one way or another. But despite these gains in the South and despite the gains and improvements among Negro Americans, there are several things I want to cite just to keep you reminded of the fact that we've got a long way to go before we reach the kind of parity with the larger part of the population that we ought to have.

The South continues to be the most depressed area in the economy. Per capita income, for example, in the region is less than three-fourths that of the rest of the nation. Eighty-five per cent of the 200 most poverty-stricken counties in the United States are located in the South. And I don't have to add that these are heavily populated by black people.

A recent report by the Citizens Board of Inquiry indicated that 242 of the 256 counties in the country which were in the hunger count were located in 13 Southern states. And these are the very states and counties, I might add, where congressmen and senators work most effectively to block policies designed to feed the hungry and to alleviate the poverty—while they also promote agriculture and other policies to lower the amount of production and drive people off the farms and out of rural areas to the cities so they can fill their pockets with $13,000 worth of payments from the taxpayers' pockets in Soil Bank and other kinds of payments designed to promote agricultural development. You know who I am talking about from the state of Mississippi, Sunflower County, who gets $13,000 a month not to produce while people are going starving right there in his county.

I'm saying here that these issues cannot be dealt with just on the basis of personality. We must come to grips with the hard issues that affect the people's stomachs, their lives, their schooling, their health and their liberties of life. The kind of thing I've just described, incidentally, is what some people call free enterprise for the poor and socialism for the rich. It was what was said about Mr. Nixon's Black Capitalism.

Negroes in the South—in Atlanta, Birmingham, places like Sunflower County, Issaquena County—on the average only earn 43 per cent of what Negroes in the North earn. Whites in the South, on the other hand, earn about 75 per cent of what whites in the North earn. The region continues to lag in education, and Negroes bear the brunt of that lag. Negroes in the South still constitute the largest and most depressed group of the nation's population.

Finally, many elements of traditional race relations persist in the South. And there are many industries and plants with all-white work forces, and these are the rule rather than the exception. We find it in our banks and our insurance companies and in communications and in radio, television and newspapers.

We've heard a great deal about the urban crisis—the crisis of our cities. One of the most obvious consequences of the concentration of black Americans in central cities is the increased difficulty in taking them out of poverty.

I would argue at this point that the thing that black elected officials must take seriously is the development of a carefully conceived body of political strategy for the Negro electorate in the South. Colleges and universities have failed miserably in providing that body of strategy, the framework of the strategy for black elected officials. But somebody is going to have to do that.

Political fortunes that have come to Negroes up to this point have come in spite of themselves more than because of political astuteness. Now, I don't mean to be indicting people—I am indicting myself as well. But I suspect that it is because of the terror of the racial ghetto, more than political astuteness, that we have been able to come by some of the political fortunes that are manifested by the group assembled here today. And while most of this strategy is applicable to all races, strategy in different situations can evolve from general principles.

For example, politics among Negroes in Atlanta is almost wholly—and I would say about 99.9 per cent—oriented toward personality. Now, a certain amount of politics is always going to play a role. In my view, Atlanta desperately needs issue-oriented politics. Anybody who knows the city of Atlanta knows what personalities do here.

The issues are clear. They are found in the poverty of our black people. They are found in our manpower inadequacies. They are found in the quality of our ghetto schools. They are found in the related services to the poor. The issues are found in the inadequacy of the grievance procedures, in the inability of people to reach certain aspects of the city government. The issues are found in the lack of consumer protection and programs. They are found in the nth degree. The issues are found in the destitution of families and children.

That brings us to the future.

We must re-examine the strategy of racial blocs. I'm not too sure but that in the near future we can rely upon racial solidarity. Now we may have a slight difference of view here, but we can rely on racial solidarity as a vehicle to accomplish our goals. This is particularly true as the two-party system in the South gains strength. That doesn't mean for a moment that I'm saying tomorrow we're going to come together when it comes to a political issue involving race. I don't think we can. But how about someone to enlighten us to the possibilities of the two-party structure and legitimate two-party structures to provide settings for the ways to proceed on racial issues? I think this strategy will have to work. I feel that the question of issues, personality politics and coalition politics also must deal with the question of the role of racial blocs. I'm simply citing this as a matter that has to be dealt with.

I was very interested in the Cabinet and the appointments made by President-elect Richard Nixon as I was visiting last night in Washington. It was said earlier that if these appointments are any criteria of what is to come, then Negroes really must come to grips with the question of strategy, because we may be in for a period of standstill in politics, insofar as national leadership is concerned. Mr. Nixon appointed a Cabinet with no Negroes, no members of the Jewish faith, no ethnic representation, and obviously pretty close to the white Anglo-Saxon principle.

The only appeal that I heard regarding the brothers and sisters by the incoming administration has been the call for black capitalism. I have studied Black Capitalism. I'm not really too sure what Mr. Nixon is asking with his Black Capitalism, but I can assure him and I can assure you and I can assure everybody else that even Black Capitalism would be of little use to the masses of New York who need help. For we want and I want all the black businesses, everybody I can get. I want all the black entrepreneurs. I want them in Harlem and I want them on Fifth Avenue in New York City, not just on Hunter and Auburn Streets in Atlanta, but at Five Points. It is an illusion to think that this approach (Black Capitalism) will transform the lives of the millions of black brothers and sisters whose lives need transforming and restitution to a reasonably normal standard of living.

I was very interested in the new representative from Mississippi, Mr. Robert Clark. He said what has happened is that Mr. Nixon did not go into the Negro community, he did not campaign, he did not seek the Negro vote, he made no effort to get it; he made it by his attitude. He said what this meant to him, if I read it correctly, is that Negroes are left out and they will be left out of what's going to happen.

Now I hope we're all wrong on this—and obviously we are not trying to prejudge completely. But the fact is that we're going to talk about political strategy on the national scene. The brothers and sisters have had to depend upon the national scene to effect the policies and the things by which we could get things done at the local scene. If we lose a hold on the national scene, if they sort of look at us as being on the periphery and not an integral part of the pursuit of the mainstream, then we've got to really re-think the strategy. And I don't think this can be done on an ad hoc basis. I don't think this can be done with people going in so many different ways. Perhaps it becomes incumbent on those who are assembled here to try to come up with the kind of things that might have meaning in this respect.

It seems to me that most political strategy—and the strategy that has caused the dynamics in urban and rural life contrary to where we thought we were just about five years ago—must continue to recognize the dynamics of race relations as a continuing and central factor in the life and order and growth and development of our people. Racial attitudes and practices continue to be factors conditioning one-third to one-half the population. Now, I say that because of the second point I want to make about this strategy: It seems to me that we must keep in mind that we are not at the point where we can abandon racial and color consciousness under the facade of color blindness. Even some of the black brothers and sisters who got elected to office right here say, I'm going to represent all of the people. That's fine. You just keep in mind that those who elected you 99 per cent of the time were black.

Secondly, you must keep in mind the fact that you must be responsive to and responsible to a color-conscious society. And it seems to me that for any black elected official to go around and say "I'm elected by all the people" without also adding "I'm going to give some special attention to the black brothers and sisters," he's going on the wrong track. I say this hoping at the same time we continue to pursue with all dignity a color-blind society.

Even the white elected officials now are always talking about, "I want to pursue this without regard to race, creed or color." Now you know that too many injustices have been heaped upon the black brothers and sisters under a color-conscious institution of racial segregation for us to expect the consequences of those injustices to be erased under a scheme of color blindness. And I've been so careful of telling you of color consciousness as a political strategy, and it must necessarily underride the strategy of Negro elected officials.

Now, I'm not a black nationalist. I'm not a Black Power advocate according to the rhetoric and slogans that you hear now. I want to be sure to be clear on that. But I am arguing here that for the forseeable future color consciousness must be part of our political strategy and our urban strategy.

What we have found in the last few years in the lives of black people appears to be a conflict in goals in race relations. And that conflict revolves around survival of racial separatism as a goal, as a philosophy and as a strategy vis-à-vis racial integration. Objectives concentrating on the development of economic and political power among black people are objectives that aren't new.

We started a group in Madison some years ago called Eagleton County Independent Political Party, and one of the first things we did back there was say it would be all Negro. That was in 1961. And we said to our white friends, we've got a role for you but not right now. The point is, there was nothing new about the building of economic and political power for the Negro. We developed a high sense of black self-respect. These were all verbal objectives.

But this does not mean building black racism. This does not mean that we have got to build hate. This does not mean that we have got to go off trying to build, as a matter of strategy, separate societies. What it does say to me is that Negro life and institutions need to be strengthened, not for separatism but for the purpose of achieving intelligent integration and maximizing contributions to the total of our pluralistic and multi-racial and democratic society. Indeed, as W. E. B. DuBois said many years ago, only when black people and white people, and black institutions and white institutions, can accept one another and interact with one another and be interwoven as part of each other's operation, respecting each other for his worth as an individual and not on the basis of color, will democracy in this country be subjected to a true test and have its opportunity to be achieved.

It is desirable that black institutions be strengthened, but not for the purpose of establishing some mystique called Black Power or for the purpose of creating black racism. They should be strengthened for the purpose of achieving a rightful place in a pluralistic society, a rightful place in a multi-racial society. You see, I'm going to have my cake and eat it too. Not only am I unwilling to abandon the goals associated with racial integration—at the same time, I reject the idea of apartheid. I also am not in favor of abandoning Negro institutions; because I believe pursuit of a democratic and interracial society is the only one that counts, and it will not be achieved without strong Negro institutions as part of that society.

I would caution those who call for even a limited separatism that this is a dangerous course. Yet somehow this still has a relevance in pursuit.

I am deeply disturbed as a president of a college over our failure to work effectively in servicing black elected officials. I have received in my office on several occasions requests from elected officials throughout the South asking for help in developing policy positions, examining the literature, examining bills, trying to help them get through to commissioners; and I have been at a loss as to how I could effectively do this within the amount of time that I have had. And yet for some reason or other I have been able to stay up at night and do some of these things to help the brothers and sisters.

We've started at Clark College what we call the Southern Center for Studies in Public Policy. We received a grant the other day for almost $200,000 to develop this center, and it has several projects. The idea is to provide some services to the brothers and sisters. Hopefully that service center and the others that are going to be established in various places in the South will be able to provide a resource whereby the black elected officials and others might call to get the kind of help they need in order to be effective in the kinds of things I've been trying to describe.

I'm going to close by simply repeating a prayer Dr. Martin Luther King used to offer on many occasions, because I think it says much about what I've tried to say here. He said: "Lord, we ain't what we've got to be, we ain't what we want to be, we ain't what we are going to be; but thank God, we ain't what we used to be."

CONFERENCE

'...America's Last Hope...'

James Mays, president of the student body at Clark College, welcomed Mayor Richard Hatcher to the college campus when he spoke at a public forum there Dec. 12. Hatcher is mayor of Mays' hometown, Gary, Ind.

Perhaps one of the tragedies of the masses of black people in the United States today is the lack of information concerning the history of their black leaders. Going through a Negro history book recently, I was amazed at the things about black politicians during the Reconstruction following the Civil War that I had never heard of. For instance, how many of us knew that at one time a black man was governor of the state of Louisiana or that from 1870 to 1901, 22 Negroes served in the Congress of the United States or of the many, many black people who served in their respective state legislatures?

All of this occurred during what we call the "old" Reconstruction, but now we speak of the "new" Reconstruction in which we are currently involved. But the sad fact is that even though we are involved in a type of political reconstruction, some of us as black students (perhaps because we so seldom see the face of a black politician in the news) still do not seem to want to become involved in the world of politics. In fact, it now seems fashionable to be as anti-government as possible. If there is a new political reconstruction going on among black people, most black students don't seem to be aware of it, or if they are aware of it, they appear to want no part of it.

Being interested in law and politics myself, I have often tried to analyze this disinterest manifested by students I associate with. After a little discussion, the answer is quite apparent. The first question a student wants to ask when you ask him if he is aware of the "new" political reconstruction is: "What happened to the old one?" And when you answer this question for him, you begin to realize from where the roots of this political disenchantment have stemmed.

Checking the Negro history book again, we read:

> The downfall of the Negro-white governments of the South was inevitable since Negroes had few guns, little land, and less government protection. Organized violence was the main weapon of those who sought to restore the old order. Masked night riders such as the Ku Klux Klan sprang up everywhere to terrorize Negro voters and their white supporters. The main Klan targets were Negro officials, teachers, and successful farmers. In 1875, a tall, muscular Negro farmer had stood before Senator George Boutwell of Massachusetts and demanded that something be done about the continued murder of his people. He was considering killing the Klan leaders responsible, saying, "We could do it in a night." "No," answered the Senator, "We intend to protect you." The promise was never kept. For the black man and for the South the result was tragedy. The torch of democracy that had burned brightly for a short while was extinguished. And Southerners would live from that day until this in the darkness of tyranny, poverty, and ignorance.

This information was taken from a book called Eyewitness: The Negro in American History.

This little passage only tells part of the story of why, as I have learned, black students are disenchanted with the political system, per se.

Some of you are probably thinking: "Why don't you remind them that the Ku Klux Klan no longer carries on its reign of terror?" If I did, they would answer: "Maybe not, but there are so many more subtle ways of keeping the black man in his place that we still see politics executed from the black frame of reference as being futile." Then they would go on: "Witness what Georgia tried to do to Julian Bond, and look at what Congress did to Adam Clayton Powell—and to take it even closer to home, notice what they tried to do to your own Mayor Hatcher during his campaign."

The question, gentlemen, is this: Is this really a "new" reconstruction or is this the same old reconstruction with the same old ending, but with different variations? My fellow students have their doubts; and I don't blame them as I, too, to some degree, have my own doubts.

But if what is happening in the realm of politics for black people today is not a fraud, then it is up to you as our spokesmen and leaders to make this crystal clear. There is no one, I repeat, no one, who can do this for you.

When Stokely Carmichael stood here where I'm standing yesterday and told an auditorium-packed audience that the only answer to our problem in this country is for us to get our guns, I wondered if it was already too late. For many students, it is. For others of us, we're saying: "O.K., America, we're willing to give you one last chance. We're foolish enough to believe that this time you may possibly allow us to grow into and of your political system." For almost all of us, this is America's last and final chance.

As we go into our new presidential administration, I can already feel the wheels of the "new" reconstruction grinding to a halt. No black man was appointed to the new Cabinet. Maybe this is nothing to become alarmed about, but many of us seem to hear Stokely's words more and more clearly each time we face this type of setback.

What this means, gentlemen, is that you have your hands full. From a student's point of view, you are America's last hope. I do not believe that I can overemphasize that point. What you accomplish while you are in office will inevitably determine the destiny of this country.

'... Power of the People ...'

Richard Gordon Hatcher, completing his first year as mayor of Gary, Ind., spoke Dec. 12 at a public forum at Clark College. The 34-year-old attorney and former city councilman is one of two black mayors of major U.S. cities. A native of Indiana and one of 13 children of a Michigan City factory worker, Hatcher was graduated from Indiana University and Valparaiso University School of Law.

When Stokely Carmichael shouted "Black Power, Black Power" in that Mississippi schoolyard, he performed the mythic function that some poet must always perform at the proper moment in history. He gave voice, he gave a name to a development in the life of Black America which was happening anyway and which needed naming so we could talk about it and think about it. I say he named it, rather than created it, because the movement towards Black Power, under other names, has had a long and honorable past. If it has become the dominant tone of our emotions and thoughts in the last two or three years, that is only because, like the proverbial snowball, the accretion of time and frustration has turned incipience into actuality, has made of the snowball an avalanche. I want, today, to look at these two words, "black" and "power," from the vantage point of a man who has had some connection with both words.

It is beyond dispute that I am black—I am too abashed to add "and beautiful," though it is tempting—and it is also a fact that I have held, for a year now, a position of at least a modicum of power. It is a good time, then, as the first year of my administration as mayor of Gary draws to a close, to examine what black power has meant to me.

My blackness has been the dominant fact of life's experience, as it is the dominant fact of the life of every black man in America, and perhaps in the world. James Baldwin, with his usual brilliance and cogency, describes the condition in his famous essay, "Stranger in the Village," in which he discusses his experience as a black man in a little Swiss village:

> For this village, even were it incomparably more remote and incredibly more primitive, is the West, the West onto which I have been so strangely grafted. These people cannot be, from the point of view of power, strangers anywhere in the world; they have made the modern world, in effect, even if they do not know it. The most illiterate among them is related, in a way that I am not, to Dante, Shakespeare, Michelangelo, Aeschylus, Da Vinci, Rembrandt, and Racine; the Cathedral at Chartres says something to them which it cannot say to me, as indeed would the Empire State Building, should anyone here ever see it. Out of their hymns and dances come Beethoven and Bach. Go back a few centuries and they are in their full glory—but I am in Africa, watching the conquerors arrive.

Because of the white man's rape of Africa, because of the ignominy of slavery, because of the long and barbarous history of segregation and discrimination, I am a stranger in this, the American village. Because white Americans have developed the ideology of racism to justify the sociological and historical experiences I have mentioned, I am a stranger in this country, in this village. But from another point of view, because I am a man, because I have been reared on the words, though not the facts, of Christianity and democracy, I am also an inhabitant, and in a strange sort of way a citizen, of the village.

Much of the history of Black America is dominated precisely by this contradiction. We have been told one thing—democracy, freedom, "We hold these truths to be self evident, that all men are created equal." We have lived quite another—slavery, the Ku Klux Klan, white liberals so concerned with black people that they will tell them exactly what they ought to want, schools that don't teach us, promises from the Supreme Court which turn to ashes in strikes against Ocean Hill-Brownsville in New York. That is why we have been forced to fall back on our own resources. For you cannot be a stranger always. To be continuously strange is to pay a psychological price so great that no people can endure it forever. When Black America, then, turns to blackness, to what in Africa has for a long time been called "negritude," we have no apologies to make.

From the time I was a little child, before I ever heard of Othello, or, for that matter, Shakespeare—I knew I was black. No wonder, then, that as a grown man I must turn to the words of Leopold Senghor, the black African poet from Senegal, or to those of Langston Hughes or Arna Bontemps or Leroi Jones or Gwendolyn Brooks. From the time I was a little child—before I ever heard of Beethoven or Bach—I knew I was black. No wonder, then, that I turn to Jimi Hendrix and Aretha Franklin, and that I recall with anger the black American symphony conductor Dean Dixon, who had to go abroad to practice his art. From the time I was a child—before I ever heard of Paul Bunyan or George Washington or Jaques Danton—I knew I was black. No wonder then, that as a grown man I turn to John Henry, Jomo Kenyatta and W. E. B. DuBois.

I will stop being a stranger, because I will recall that, though a stranger in this village, I have lived there nonetheless, and I have a history there, and elsewhere, as in Africa, and that history will make me less the stranger. We assert what we are, and we may wear a dashiky and look with favor on a "natural." Being ourselves will make us less the stranger. We tried being like the so-called natives, and were not allowed to be like them, and so we must turn to our own resources. Baldwin says,

> The black man insists, by whatever means he finds at his disposal, that the white man cease to regard him as an exotic rarity and recognize him as a human being.

So my experience with the word black is that of all black people. Being black has made me a stranger; being black has dominated my life. I cannot, nor would I wish to reject my blackness, and so I turn what the white world has attempted make a handicap precisely into its opposite. Black America is fortunate in that our history and culture are more than rich enough so we can find in blackness an advantage, a source of pride, a way to end our estrangement.

But there is another side to this. Even though I may find in negritude and in black culture a way not to be so strange any longer, especially strange to myself, that is not enough. For my estrangement has also included my powerlessness. I have not only been a stranger in the village, but I have also been a stranger without power. There are times in history when strangers have had sufficient power to keep themselves at least supplied with the necessaries for decent living. This has been true of many who came as strangers to American shores, as, after a generation or so, the Irish, the Italians, what have you. It has not been the case with black Americans. We have been kept strangers, in part at least, because our strangeness has provided the others, white Americans, I mean, with a cheap source for the sawing of wood and the drawing of water. Because black people have had no power, because the ideology of racism has permitted white Americans to think it natural, we have been exploited and used, deprived of the minimum wherewithal for a decent life, have provided the nation with back-breaking and menial labor, and sometimes with its best brains, all for the aggrandizement and enrichment of others.

That is why pride in being black is not enough for our survival. That is why we have increasingly had to turn our attention to a means of wresting from the majority not only a new perception of our humanity, but also a new place in the nation, so that we can enforce our demands for the satisfacion of our needs.

This is nothing new. The African chief Cinque sought power when he led a mutiny on the slave ship Amisted in 1839. Nat Turner is quite explicit when he says that the reason for his revolt is so that he can strike terror into the hearts of the planters and thus have the power to establish a black community in the Dismal Swamp. Toussaint L'Ouverture knew about the need for power, and so did, in more recent history, such often unheeded thinkers as W. E. B. DuBois and Paul Robeson, or, for that matter, Marcus Garvey. There is nothing new in the search for power by black Americans. What is new, perhaps, is that our search has been intensified because we have combined pride in being black with that search for power, and that we have found, in various stages of our experience, that power shared with the white majority doesn't seem to work.

Power means, quite simply, a force strong enough so you can get whatever it is you need. Let me recall that in the last two decades or so we have tried all sorts of ways of achieving power.

The Brown decision by the U.S. Supreme Court concerning equal education represented an effort to use the power of the courts to win needed improvements in the lives of black children. We won that skirmish, but we have discovered, almost 15 years later, that there was not enough strength in the power of the courts to guarantee any fundamental change in the education of black children. Legal power, which helped a little, did not help enough.

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. tried another form of power. Beginning with the Montgomery Bus Boycott of 1955, Dr. King tried with all of his skill and dedication—indeed, he gave his life for it—to use the nonviolent power of black masses to achieve their needs. An eloquent man, he said it much better than I can hope to do. Writing in Liberation in 1959, Dr. King said:

> There is more power in socially organized masses on the march than there is in guns in the hands of a few desperate men. . . . All American history teaches us that like a turbulent ocean beating great cliffs into fragments of rock, the determined movement of people incessantly demanding their rights always disintegrates the old order. . . . This is the social lever which will force open the door to freedom. Our powerful weapons are the voices, the feet, and the bodies of dedicated, united people, moving without rest toward a just goal.

This, too, was a form of black power, though we did not then call it such. But this form of power, in and of itself, we also found not adequate to our needs. Nine years after he had written those words, Dr. King had fallen to the white assassin's bullet. Nine years after he had written those words, though segregation was a little less blatant in the South, though more black people had found their way to the voting booth in the South, the bulk of Black America, living in the horror of the crowded, fire trap-haunted ghettos of the North, had not advanced two inches. This society, it would appear, was not prepared to yield easily to the needs of Black America, and so the search for a lever, for an effective means of achieving power, had to go on.

We learned something else at this point, taught by Malcolm X and Leroi Jones and H. Rap Brown and Eldridge Cleaver. We learned that when the stranger allies himself with the so-called natives, to return to Baldwin's metaphor, it is very hard for the stranger to play anything but a secondary role. In the many struggles black Americans carried on together with white people, we found all too often that well-meaning whites nevertheless conceived of us as strangers, assigned to us the role of strangers in our own struggle. Thus, well-meaning white people knew what was good for us—better than we did. They knew what our feelings about things ought to be—better than we did. I say that many of these men and women were well-meaning white people, because history records that they worked very hard and often sacrificed a good deal for our causes. I cannot forget that it was a white Goodman and Schwerner who died along with black James Chaney in the red dirt of Mississippi. But it takes nothing away from their heroism or dedication to say that they were always, willingly or not, the natives, and we were always the strangers.

To stop being strangers, we had to find the road to power ourselves. Whether or not one fully accepts other aspects of the thought of Franz Fanon, it is clear that rising black consciousness requires that we be led by our own, determine our own destiny, recognize our own needs, and that white Americans have quite another task to perform—perhaps an impossible one—which is to work to cure the sickness of racism among their own people, to work on changes needed in the total society, which affect everyone who lives within it.

Efforts at achieving power in various forms, combined with the rising tide of black self-confidence, then, bring us to the heart of the problem faced by Black America today, and to the heart of the problem about which this conference is deliberating, and to the heart of my own problems as a man who has achieved some modicum, as I have said, of power. It is clear that pride in blackness, and all that this implies, from a revival of black history and other Afro-American studies, to a new appreciation of the beauty of our women, to being led on the road to a better life by black leaders, is an absolute necessity if we are to end our status as strangers. This we are beginning to do. We have not yet, however, solved the riddle as to what lever or levers can provide the power we need to wrest a better way of life from the power structure within the total society. We have a number of options, and I would like to discuss a few of these now, including the one about which I am most knowedgeable.

One option is, of course, to leave, to return not only spiritually but physically to the lands of our African heritage.

No doubt some will choose that solution, but it cannot be a solution for most of us. There are physical problems as to where such a massive migration would go, and cultural ones stemming from our distance from African cultures. But there are also other aspects. We own a good part of these United States—not physically, but morally. Our sweat has gone to make the railroads run and to make cotton king. Our brains helped building Washington, D.C., and made heart transplants possible. Our talents have helped enrich the music, the stage, the poetry of the nation. Our blood has been shed in too many wars—including the fiasco in which we are now engaged. So we have a great investment in this nation, one we ought not to be forced to give up. Our power ought to give us our rightful share in what we have wrought. Therefore, I for one choose not to leave.

There is another approach. We can demand a piece of the nation for ourselves. We can demand five or six states as the territory for a black nation, or we can carve out the old ghetto in each city as our own turf. This has possibilities, and it has been explored by many thinkers both black and white, including so thoughtful a man as W. H. Ferry, the vice-president of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions. Ferry writes, in the Saurday Review of June 15, 1968:

> But what Blacktown most wants, Whitetown cannot confer. Blacktown wants independence and the authority to run its own affairs. It wants to recover its manhood, its self-love, and to develop its ability to conduct a self-reliant community. . . . A successful plan for coexistence (that is, between Blacktown and Whitetown, to use Ferry's terms —I continue to quote) will not bring Utopia into being in Blacktown. Autonomous, interdependent Blacktown will be no better and no worse than other parts of the urban scene. Blacks can be expected to exploit blacks, even as whites exploit whites. There will be quarrels and walkouts and demonstrations and the inevitable ambiguities about leaders and leadership. . . . Whitetown will be accused of parsimony and trying to control things even if it enters into the scheme of coexistence with the best possible intent. . . . So the vision of coexistence is not that of the New Jerusalem, nor is it that of a national community struggling with the untenable doctrines of integration. It is a vision of a new federalism that will give 10 per cent of our citizens the chance they are seeking to make whatever they want to make of themselves, their culture, and their community.

I do not reject this form of power either on moral grounds, or on grounds of feasibility. But I have not seen any evidence within this society that Black America can get such communities without first achieving the tremendous power necessary to force them into existence. The white power structure which pinches pennies from Model Cities plans and Headstart programs will not readily give up control of major sections of New York, Chicago and Los Angeles. The slumlords who live in pretty suburbs on the profits they make from hellholes in the ghetto will not turn their hovels over to other owners for the asking. Blacktowns are intriguing, but they beg the question; for we must, should we decide we want them, first find the power to get them.

There is also the power of violence, in direct opposition to the kind of power Dr. King sought to use. I do not wish here to discuss this form of power—and that it certainly is—from an ethical point of view, though that is surely a matter for consideration. Rather I want to ask about the efficacy of the use of street violence, about its ability to achieve results.

Like it or not, violence cannot readily be dismissed as a source of power. It is true beyond dispute that the white section of the nation sat up and listened hard when it heard the fire engines race to Hough and Watts and Harlem and Chicago's West Side. But I am afraid that, to date, this form of power has also not paid off very much. White America talks better about what it ought to do, in the wake of one of these insurrections—but such talk has been around for a long time, and is hardly new. In fact, all that street violence has provided so far is more white talk and burned-over ghettos. The Kerner Report is a nice piece of rhetoric, which has not fed one black mouth. I do not reject violence out of hand then, but I have yet to see how it becomes a useful lever for power.

Let me turn finally to the kind of power I know the most about, that is, political power in cities of large black populations. I think it clear, in the first place, that my election as mayor of Gary has done something for Gary's black community in so far as its pride and sense of self is concerned. While we may still be strangers in our village, it surely makes us feel less strange that one of us has been chosen to head the village government. Furthermore, this fact guarantees that local efforts will be made so that we will not be exploited quite so mercilessly, that our people will get their share of whatever they have coming, to the extent that anything is available.

But right there is the rub. I may be mayor of Gary, but I cannot, by that token, guarantee that black people will share in the unbelievable profits of the U.S. Steel Corporation which dominates our city's economic life. I am mayor of Gary, but I cannot stop a war in Vietnam which drains the national treasury to such an extent that only very limited programs are available to the city for the reconstruction of its black community. I am mayor of Gary, and I was elected as a Democrat, but I am not able to sway the white Democratic Party so that it will reverse the present trend of national priorities and make the needs of black communities first on the list. I am mayor of Gary, but I cannot change the fact that our schools are too poorly funded, from state or nation or even local sources of revenue, to provide the catch-up educational process that the city needs in order to bring our black youngsters up to educational standards.

I want to confide a further problem to you. I am mayor of Gary, and thus I am mayor of all the people of the city, and I would like to do my best for all of them, black or white. But you know, what I cannot do for my black brothers, I cannot do for white people either, try as I might. Though the black community's needs are infinitely greater, the white community in our city is not without problems. But for the same reasons which prevent me from solving many black problems, I cannot solve many white ones, either—and neither could my white predecessors. Though I have some local political power, it becomes clearer to me that this is not enough, and that the power structure of this society is not prepared to give up enough of its profits to solve the problems of city living—for whites or blacks. Though black kids in Gary are badly educated, white ones are not getting nearly what they should, either. Though black communities are devoid of parks and play spaces, white communities do not have adequate park facilities either.

There are, rumor has it, a few white people in Gary who wish to disaffiliate from the municipality a predominantly white section of the city because they "don't like what's going on in City Hall." It seems that, while they were able to stomach the jailing of several earlier mayors for one form or another of municipal corruption, they just can't abide whatever it is that a black mayor is doing, though not one has accused him of appropriating for himself one dishonest penny. But I would warn these white citizens that disaffiliation will not solve one single problem for them—except perhaps their hurt racial pride. For the fact of the matter is that the local political lever for power, black or white, can only do very limited things, that it cannot really solve the problems faced by the American city until the entire power structure is in some way forced to yield up to the people—first to black people, but eventually to all the people—what the people need and deserve.

The question of power, it becomes more and more apparent, cannot be left at the level of parochial power. Black Power, whatever its form—political, non-violent confrontation, street riots or terror—may help us to feel less the stranger; but it will not eliminate poverty, or inadequate educational facilities, or slum housing, or provide us even a portion of the economic control of the life of the nation. Even if it were possible to establish the blacktowns that Ferry talks about, black people would not have control over the basic economic, foreign policy or social welfare priority decisions which will determine the welfare of black people as well as whites. Blacktowns might make us feel better—and that is terribly important and so I do not reject such ideas —but they will not make us live better.

And what is true of Black Power is also true of other forms of group power. Our campuses, for example, have seen a demand for student power which has a great deal of legitimacy.

Surely students ought to play a much larger role in the life of the university, which is their community for four or more years. But student power will not, by itself, change the national system of priorities in which education runs far behind spending for super-weapons of destruction, in which drafting young men for war is more important than letting them continue their studies beyond a bachelor's degree so that they can apply their knowledge to the alleviation of human suffering. Student power, like Black Power, like youth power, like other parochial forms of power, can only achieve very limited gains.

Where does this leave us? Am I rejecting the drive for Black Power? Am I hopelessly saying that nothing we may do can be of use? The answer is a clear and decisive No! The drive for Black Power is an essential, it seems to me a no longer debatable need; for it will help to end our strangeness in the village, and that is absolutely necessary. So I support all forms of Black Power which will help Black America to define itself, to recapture its heritage, to assert its abilities, to realize its most immediate demands.

It is not immodest on my part to say that Gary's black children will be richer and stronger human beings for the knowledge that one of their own can govern the city, for the knowledge that their mothers and fathers were able to get themselves together enough to elect one of their own and thus assert their dignity. Nor is it immodest to say that Gary's black community is being given, for the first time in its history, some of the attention and concern which it so richly deserves, and that the lives of black men and women will be somewhat the better for it. These are among the things which Black Power can and ought to and must do.

But beyond that, if I look to the alleviation of our poverty and the improvement of our standard of life, logic compels me to place hope in the eventual coming-together of the demands for power by people of many sorts. I see hope in the rising tide of student militancy, if that militancy is carried, in time, from the campuses into the communities of the entire nation. I see hope in the demands of Spanish-speaking Americans for their share of power. I see hope in the growing radicalism of the young, who demand youth power and are no longer content to accept a dehumanized status quo. I see our only hope for a decent society in the coming together sometime in the future, of all these demands for partial and parochial power into a total demand for people power.

I do not pretend to be very hopeful. The experiences of Black America with other segments of our society have most often been disappointing. Perhaps they will be again. But I am certain that the only way to rescue our lives from the poverty for some, the alienation for all which are its hallmarks, is by the combination of the kinds of people power I have been talking about. Should that fail, what lies before us is chaos and dark nights of despair and destruction. The leaven in such a rising power cake must be, and already is to some extent, Black Power, for Black America has the least to lose, and the most to gain, by its assertion of power.

In the essay I have already quoted, Baldwin concludes with the following:

> No road whatever will lead Americans back to the simplicity of this European village where white men still have the luxury of looking on me as a stranger. I am not, really, a stranger any longer for any American alive. One of the things that distinguishes Americans from other people is that no other people has ever been so deeply involved in the lives of black men, and vice versa. . . . It is precisely this black-white experience which may prove of indispensable value to us in the world we face today. This world is white no longer, and it will never be white again.

That is what we hope America will realize as we achieve more and more the power which our blackness demands. If we try to save ourselves, if we achieve the full potential of what Black Power can do, then it will be up to the rest of America, white, Spanish-speaking, student, youth, and so on and on, to join us in the establishment of the power of the people in a world in which none are strangers. If they fail, or if we fail, we may have no way left to live in this country. If they can succeed, and if we can succeed, if the people can wrest control from the hands of the economic overlords and the political self-servers, the rich and the powerful, then and only then do we have some hope that the good society can be ours.

One of the finest of our black poets, Margaret Walker, ends her poem "For My People," with a kind of incantation to the future. Let me cite it here, for her vision, the vision of a black woman who wrote these words more than a quarter of a century ago, still holds true:

> Let a new earth rise. Let another world be born. Let a bloody peace be written in the sky. Let a second generation full of courage issue forth; let a people loving freedom come to growth. Let a beauty full of healing, a strength of final clenching be the pulsing and the spirit in our blood. Let the martial song be written, let dirges disappear. Let a race of men now rise and take control.

A race of men, Margaret Walker says! For God's sake, for America's sake, let's get ourselves together!

'...Difficult Decisions Must Be Made...'

Alfred M. Pelham, chairman of Great Lakes Mutual Life Insurance Company in Detroit, appeared on a panel on "Revenue and Taxation and the Elected Official" Dec. 13. He is a former controller of the city of Detroit.

Before proceeding to any discussion of revenue and taxation, I believe it to be of utmost importance to emphasize the fact that the levy and collection of taxes and the collection of other forms of revenue and other income from whatever source constitute only one aspect of the responsibility and the problems which confront elected officials at every level of government. Of even greater importance are the judicious determination of the purposes for which available resources are to be expended, the selection of programs best calculated to accomplish these purposes, the best possible allocation of available resources to carry out these programs, and appropriate systems to assure that such resources are expended as effectively as possible for authorized and intended purposes.

In order to attain these ends, difficult decisions must be made and orderly operational programs must be carried out on the basis of carefully developed plans. It is obvious, therefore, that financial resources, while absolutely indispensable, constitute only one of the ingredients required for the effective and efficient conduct of government.

Another vital ingredient is a sound budgetary process. The word budget means different things to different people. In the simplest terms, a budget is a projected and reasonably flexible plan for the effective use of available resources for the accomplishment of one or more carefully defined future objectives. As a matter of fact, all of us, whether consciously or unconsciously, are almost constantly involved in the process of budgeting: budgeting of time, budgeting of space, budgeting of energy, and budgeting of money and other material resources.

In any case where available resources exceed the cost of all needed and desired services, formal budgeting might seem to be of less importance; but even in such a case effectual results would almost certainly depend upon carefully planned usage of such resources. Whenever, on the other hand, there are many demands on limited resources, the processes of priority establishment and resource allocation must be utilized if anything approaching optimum resources is to be attained. Where the unit of government is small and the demands for service are few, the process of budgeting is not likely to prove too difficult even in the face of limited resources. For those charged with the responsibility of conducting the affairs of larger and more complex governmental units, an adequate budgetary system is absolutely essential. In every case, it is important to maintain complete accounting records in order to assure proper accountability for the expenditure of public funds.

The brief reference that I have made in the foregoing to program planning, evaluation, and selection and to the budgetary process has been included only in order to put the fiscal responsibility of elected officials in proper perspective. In-depth coverage of these other important aspects of financial management should be given consideration as the subject matter for future meetings of this group, since our attention today is to be focused primarily on revenue and taxation.

Before proceeding to the discussion of any specific taxes or other sources of revenue, certain general observations seem to be in order. In considering the levy of any new tax, or even in reviewing an existing tax structure, attention should be given to certain basic criteria, chief among which are: equitableness, productivity, flexibility, collectibility, and administrative feasibility.

Since the primary purpose of taxation is to provide essential revenue, it is obvious that the productivity of any tax is of great importance. When the extent of need for revenue has been established, the potential productivity of any tax or combination of taxes should be estimated as accurately as possible in order to predetermine whether the projected goal can be attained by the levy of such tax or taxes. It is further desirable that such tax or taxes be subject to upward or downward revision within reasonable limits in order to provide a degree of flexibility which may avoid the subsequent necessity for the levy of some new or additional tax.

Careful consideration should also be given to the factors of collectibility and administrative feasibility. Some apparently proper subjects for taxation pose problems of collectibility because of indicated difficulties in enforcement. In other cases, estimated costs of levy and collection constitute such a high percentage of potential yield as to make such taxes impracticable. In this area of concern, every effort should be made to avoid a multiplicity of different taxes, not only because of administrative problems and higher costs of collection, but also because too many different taxes are a nuisance to the tax-paying public.

The most important criterion in determining the use of any tax or combination of taxes should, in my judgment, be that of equitableness. An equitable tax structure might well be defined as one in which each person bore his or her fair share of the tax burden, or as one in which taxes were levied in accordance with ability to pay. It is obviously easier to define such a tax system than it is to attain it. There are wide differences of opinion as to what constitutes a fair share, and neither economists nor political scientists have been successful in satisfactorily measuring the limits of ability to pay.

However, despite the fact that there is no pat formula for attaining tax equity in designing a tax structure, in modifying an existing one, or in levying a new and additional tax, the best possible judgment should be used in attempting to make equitableness a primary consideration. This consideration, of course, should be extended to all, but with particular attention to those least able to pay and also to business and industry lest a too heavy tax burden result in a loss of potential job opportunities and a weakening of the economic base upon which the community depends for its existence. It should, perhaps, be mentioned at this point that certain types of taxes can be made more equitable by the appropriate use of exemptions.

Unfortunately, our present-day tax systems at every level of government have tended to grow by a series of patchwork additions from time to time as additional revenue was needed, with the result that by and large they are not equitable. In an article entitled "Who Really Gets Hurt by Taxes," which appeared in the December 9, 1968 issue of U. S. News and World Report, it is stated that the widely held idea that taxes in the U.S. "soak the rich and spare the poor" is erroneous, but rather that families with the lowest incomes tend to bear the heaviest tax burden in terms of ability to pay. While it is true that the graduated federal income tax takes a greater percentage of the income of those in the upper brackets, many other taxes make a bigger dent in the pocketbooks of lower income families.

The latter is particularly true of the payroll tax (Social Security), the property tax, and the sales tax. As an example, on Jan. 1, 1969 the payroll deduction for Social Security will be 4.8 per cent on earnings up to $7,800. Obviously everybody earning $7,800 or less will be paying 4.8 per cent of their earnings for this purpose; but because of the limit, those earning $12,000 will pay only 3.12 per cent of their total earnings, those earning $18,000 only 2.08 per cent, those earning $24,000 only 1.56 per cent, and so on down the line.

In the case of property taxes, according to the article referred to above, those making less than $7,000 a year pay six to eight cents out of each dollar of income, on average, whereas those in brackets above $25,000 average only 2 per cent of income for property taxes. It was further indicated that sales taxes take nearly a nickel out of every dollar earned by families in the lowest income brackets, as against a penny or two at the upper end of the income scale. It should be remembered that the above figures are based on nationwide averages and, therefore, that they may vary significantly between states and communities. In any event, the property tax and the sales tax tend to fall with heavier impact on those in the lower income brackets with relation to ability to pay, and yet state and local governments lean most heavily on those two taxes as major sources of tax revenue.

At the federal level, at least, increasing concern is currently being expressed relative to the heavy burden of taxation on low-income taxpayers; and many forms of possible relief are being tentatively proposed, such as increasing the income below which no federal income tax would have to be paid, reducing rates in the lowest income tax brackets, increasing the minimum standard deduction for expenses, increasing personal exemptions, giving tax credits for each personal exemption claimed by a low-income family, refunding Social Security taxes paid by low-income families, payment of "negative income taxes," etc. From time to time, studies have been conducted at both the state and local levels of government aimed at tax reform; but few, if any, of these have thus far resulted in any significant improvement of tax structures. Hopefully some of this good intent will soon be translated into action.

Although taxation provides the largest source of governmental revenue, there are many other potential sources of income including license fees; other fines, fees, and permits; income from sales of services; reimbursements for services performed; grants-in-aid; shared taxes, and other miscellaneous sources. These non-tax sources are utilized for a number of different reasons and, in some cases, a combination of reasons, such as:

1. To provide added revenue
2. To exercise control in the protection of health, public safety, property, etc.
3. To protect other public interests
4. To serve as a punitive measure
5. To secure total or partial reimbursement for certain services
6. To provide for intergovernmental cost sharing
7. To stimulate activity and improvement in respect to specified public services

In order that some of you who have had only limited experience in the field of public finance may get a better idea of the large number and great variety of potential tax and other revenue sources that are currently being utilized by state and local governments, you have or will be furnished with an outline of such sources. While fairly complete, it is not professed that it is inclusive of all such tax and revenue sources in use throughout the country. In some cases, comparable taxes may be levied in different governmental jurisdictions bearing entirely different names. I wish to make it very clear that, in presenting this outline, there is absolutely no intent on my part to suggest the use of any particular tax or combination of taxes. Local conditions, economic factors, and legal restrictions vary significantly between geographic areas and must, or should, be taken into consideration in the structuring or restructuring of any tax and revenue system.

At this point in time, practically all governmental units at every level are being confronted by the same dilemma-increasing demands for public services, sharply increasing costs, and an inadequate tax and revenue potential. In many cases, therefore, unless there is to be a sharp curtailment in these public services or a lessening in their quality and effectiveness, it seems (even after every reasonable effort has been made to improve efficiency) that increases in existing taxes, or the levy of some new and additional tax or taxes, or the seeking out of some alternate source of revenue is inevitable. Wherever and whenever this proves to be the case, it is of the utmost importance that the five basic criteria mentioned earlier in this discussion be given most careful consideration before any decision is made to change the tax structure.

Quite obviously time does not permit any attempt on my part to discuss each of the different tax sources that are listed on the outline to which I have made previous reference. In the question and answer period which I understand is to follow the presentation of your panelists, there will be an opportunity for you to ask about any of these in which you may have a particular interest. Two of them, however, the property tax and the sales tax—which are heavily depended upon by both state and local governments—deserve at least brief mention. Both of these taxes are productive and reasonably flexible, but both tend to place a disproportionate burden on taxpayers in the lowest income brackets, as has been previously pointed out.

The property tax is one of the oldest and most used among all taxes currently being levied. It does not pose any serious problem of collectibility, for, if there is a failure to pay, the tax becomes a lien upon the property in question. It is not a particularly easy tax to administer, for there is involved the necessity of separately assessing each individual parcel of property, of maintaining extensive tax and assessment rolls, of keeping property assessments accurate and up-to-date, of developing uniform assessment procedures, and of equalizing assessed valuations on a state or county-wide basis. The use of the property tax is further complicated in many jurisdictions by statutory and constitutional restrictions and by a large number of different provisions for complete or partial exemption. In some jurisdictions the property tax is also extended to personal property; and, in these cases, administration becomes even more difficult and problems of enforcement are introduced. Nonetheless, the property tax is apparently here to stay for at least the foreseeable future, and it is therefore important that it be administered as effectively and as equitably as possible.

There is considerable variation in the manner in which the sales tax is used by governmental agencies across the country. It can be made applicable to the sales of services, as well as the sales of commodities. It can be made applicable to all sales, or provision can be made for exemption on the sales of such commodities as fool, drugs and/or certain basic clothing items. In the latter case the administration of the tax, which normally poses few problems, becomes more difficult and complicated, particularly for those who collect the tax at the original source.

In conclusion, I wish to make brief reference to the financing of major capital projects such as the construction of public buildings, highways, water and sewer facilities, etc. In some cases and to a certain extent, capital improvements may be financed out of current revenue, which method is generally referred to as financing on a "pay-as-you-go" basis. This method has considerable merit and may prove desirable in the case of long-term capital programs which provide for large annual expenditures over a considerable number of years, as might be the case in an extended highway construction program.

More frequently, however, major capital projects which are expected to have a relatively long life are financed by the issuance of bonds. This method of financing is justified by the fact that, at least to some degree, it tends to spread the costs over the period of years during which the capital project will continue in use. In no case is it desirable that the payment of a bond issue extend for a period in excess of the estimated useful life of the capital improvement. It is, of course, possible to finance capital improvement programs by an appropriate combination of "pay-as-you go" and bond financing.

Bonds issued by states and local units of government fall into two general categories—full faith and credit bonds and revenue bonds. The former category, which involves a pledge of the full faith and credit of the particular governmental unit, is normally used in cases where the capital project will not generate any revenue or insufficient revenue to cover the debt service of the bond issue. In the case of capital projects in respect to which it can be demonstrated that sufficient revenue will be generated to cover the debt service by an adequate margin, revenue bonds are generally used.

At the local level of government, a third category of bonds may be used which are known as special assessment bonds or special district bonds. The legal establishment of a special assessment district is a prerequisite to the issuance of such bonds. These bonds are issued to cover the costs of such projects as drains, sewers, water facilities, roads, etc., and require that the debt service be adequately covered by the levy of special property tax assessments against the benefitted property within the district over a long enough period to pay off the bond issue.

The ability of any unit of government to issue bonds and to issue them at a favorable interest rate is directly related to the financial stability of that unit of government. If such financial stability is questionable, it frequently becomes either impossible or prohibitively expensive to issue bonds. For this and many other reasons, I urge upon all of you most serious concern for the sound and effective management of the financial affairs of your respective units of government.

'...Know Your Authority...'

Gerald A. Lamb, a native of Elizabeth City, N.C., is treasurer of the state of Connecticut. He has also served as president pro tem of the board of aldermen and as acting mayor of his present home, Waterbury, Conn. He was one of three Negro financial experts on a panel on revenue and taxation.

I am indeed most honored to serve on this distinguished panel of financial experts, but of equal honor is this opportunity to share with you some of my experiences that may offer to you an expressway of financial genius and expertise in your transactions rather than a dirt road of bumpy pitfalls, frustrations and despair.

It is always gratifying for me to return to the South, for after all I am a product of a proud but poor family of the South. In fact, last evening when I flew over the eastern shores of North Carolina where I was born, I found myself in a rather nostalgic mood. Reflecting back over the years, I could remember vividly the day more than 26 years ago I marched off to defend this nation, and how paradoxical it was that I should want to defend this nation, for I had just spent more than two months searching for a job behind doors that remained closed to us. I reconciled my concern for this nation or this system at that time by saying that "things will be better some day." How prophetic, for I returned to the South last night, not as a frustrated, disillusioned and angry young man, but as an individual somewhat older, yes, somewhat balder, but also the treasurer of one of the 50 states. Let no one deceive you, this is progress, and the number of elected officials present today suggests to me that you in the South are also enjoying progress.

Our topic or theme, as has been stated, is "Revenue and Taxation." If we, as panelists, are to complement but not duplicate each other, perhaps each of us can touch generally on the broad implications of the topic but zero in on the areas that touch our present responsibilities. As treasurer of a state, I would like to at least discuss one area that perhaps the other panelists may overlook.

My remarks to you as elected or potential public financial officials will stress two general themes: the necessity of having a clear definition of one's authority and responsibility, and the necessity of utilizing competent advice.

Let us review carefully the first question for a moment—What is your authority and responsibility? May I first caution you against asking your predecessor or any other elected or appointed official in your locale. All too often their advice is both inconsistent and incomplete. My advice is simple—review, analyze and thoroughly familiarize yourself with your city or town charter, state or county statutes, ordinances, rules, and regulations pertaining to the office you hold.

The obvious reason to know your authority and responsibility is to perform and execute your duties properly, but of equal importance is to always be on guard that someone else does not perform your job for you by usurpation of authority. Your authority and jurisdiction may be much broader in scope and dimension than you anticipated or realized. It is no secret in Connecticut that my election as treasurer of Connecticut has made everyone aware of that constitutional office and its vast jurisdiction. And, I might add, for those few who were not aware of it, I have a way of reminding them—and this includes other state officials frequently.

It is not unusual for me to quote my powers enumerated in chapter 32 of the general statutes. It says: "The treasurer is responsible for receiving, depositing, and disbursing all state funds; collecting and distributing certain taxes and fees; servicing all state bond issues, investing surplus money; borrowing of funds when required, administering the financing of all state-owned public housing."

The treasurer is custodian of all securities pledged by insurance companies, all pension funds, and deeds to properties owned or controlled by our state. He is the escheat or abandoned property administrator and serves on the Banking Commission, Bond Commission, and Finance Advisory Commission.

I have listed these responsibilities to illustrate to you the necessity for knowing your authority. The position of treasurer had gone unnoticed because my predecessors either did not know the scope of their authority or did not elect to use it.

It has been suggested by some that the true impact of my job was not known until it was too late. With your indulgence, I would like to add a bit of humor. Those of you whose wives are the keepers of the family purse realize the influence of the mate with the money. I am certain you can almost agree that if you have the money, you have almost everything, because at least you have some influence.

Moving quickly to my second theme (utilizing competent advice), I cannot overstress the importance of seeking advice in this complex society because it is impossible to be an expert on all facets of finance. Public officials are and must be especially dependent on both legal and financial advice. Any man who thinks he knows all is destined to ruin himself and his state, county, or town.

I have used these two central themes with emphasis, because as we proceed through five important areas of special interest to local finance officers, you will realize their importance.

Using some personal experience and observations in these five areas, I will not attempt to give a technical discourse on each because the technicalities differ by state and area; but instead I want to offer some helpful hints.

The five areas of concern to public financial officials that I will comment on are:

I Administrative practices
II Public relations responsibilities
III Handling deposits
IV Investment of money
V Borrowing money

If I were giving a lecture on administration, I would discuss the practices of setting goals, selecting personnel, and coordinating and guiding their efforts with sophistication toward these goals. But today, rather than misguide or deceive you about our genius, I would rather talk about a very simple but helpful everyday tool I use for accomplishing these rather lofty goals, i.e., a "calendar of events." A simple, accurately maintained calendar goes a long way toward making a good administrator. In addition to maintaining a prompt and efficient personal calendar, this also enables you to coordinate your many diverse office functions and carefully program and project duties. As a public financial official this is especially important, because your responsibilities are very often defined in terms of legal dates and it would be disastrous to miss timely execution. Maturing dates of notes or bonds or restrictions specifying dates, often written into the authorizing legislation, are prime examples of important dates to be listed on calendars of events.

I cannot stress too strongly the continuing aspects of your public relations responsibilities. If you are an elected official, you must always remember the first requirement is to get re-elected. This means consideration of public relations factors every day and not just during election year.

It goes without saying that the basis of good public relations is a sound and efficient operation. After all, one cannot cover over inefficiencies for long. Granting this, you still have to communicate the soundness of your operation day in and day out to the public. Overlooking public relations has increased the casualties of some extremely expert and efficient finance officials.

One of the most basic rules for good public relations is to do everything within reason to "avoid inconveniencing the people."

Let me give some concrete examples of the public relations considerations that affect a finance officer's responsibilities in just one area, the issuance of bonds.

First, to the voters, here I can point out:

(A) A need for stressing the positive benefits of a proposed bond issue and the merits and benefits to be derived from this capital expenditure. This is particularly important if the authorization is by public referendum.

(B) The necessity for not confusing the voter with side questions or complicating his understanding by combining projects into large, incomprehensible, omnibus packages.

(C) Above all, when possible, time the referendum away from vacations and holidays. The support of the more affluent citizen, who could possibly be away, may mean the difference between success or defeat.

Second, to the bond rating agencies:

It is extremely important that the rating agencies of Moody's, Standard and Poor's and Dun and Bradstreet be continually informed about the financial and economic condition of your community. In essence, you should make full disclosure on a continuous basis. All positive attributes of community should be stressed. A credit rating of AAA or A or BA can mean hundreds of dollars in interest cost savings to the tax payer.

Third, to the underwriters and investors:

Again I repeat the importance of keeping this group completely informed about the community's financial and economic condition. If you desire a good sale, schedule the sale for a convenient day (not a holiday) and at a convenient time (11 a.m. rather than 9 a.m. or 7 in the evening).

These examples of public relations considerations at all levels of contact when issuing bonds is cited to stress the continuing aspects of your public relations responsibilities. Careful attention here not only helps the community (a lower borrowing cost) but also helps you (a requirement for re-election).

Leaving these more general administrative and public relations responsibilities, we can now discuss the more specific functional areas of concern to a finance official —handling deposits, investments, and borrowings.

As a finance officer, your core duties usually center around this important public trust. There are several recommendations that I deem important. You must not delegate the responsibility for determining the bank depositories or the cash level of each account. It is your neck if a bank fails or defaults, and it is also your responsibility to determine your cash requirements based on projected expenditures and experiences of prior years. A good system of checks and balances along with accounting controls are mandatory. We in Connecticut believe in the honor and integrity of our state employees, and this is the reason for bonding all individuals who handle money (smile). We bond them as a precaution in the event that we have misjudged their character. I would suggest that you do likewise. I repeat, accounting controls are absolutely necessary.

As a financial official you will have monies on hand above needed working balances, monies upon which you want to earn a return!

Again, the legal question—What authority do you have to invest? For example, in Connecticut, most local communities can utilize only treasury obligations or bank certificates of deposit. Some states have broader authority which often includes commercial paper or other government agencies. Once you have ascertained the legal authority or requirements, you still have the need for determining the amounts, maturities or the type of investments.

Here, competent financial advice must be sought. The rationale for investing is simple—define your needs, select investments to meet your needs—but the execution demands specialized knowledge of the characteristics of many different but legal investments as well as up-to-date knowledge of markets.

One source of investment help can be your local banker. Select those bankers with competence in the investment area. It may be beneficial to seek out a larger institution with trained specialists in another community if your local banker has only a limited knowledge of this area of work, especially the mechanics of buying and selling securities, an important consideration when selecting your investment advisor.

Pension funds and other custodial and trust accounts in most instances, because of their long term investment features, require other types of consultants such as investment brokers, actuarial scientists, or those with insurance expertise.

I must repeat once again, competent legal and financial advice is mandatory.

Under legal advice—the field of law surrounding borrowing money by government units is highly specialized. You should:

—Select a bond attorney experienced in your state whose legal opinion is marketable, or in other words, whose legal opinion has proved acceptable to bidders of previous issues. Your close friend who happens to practice law or your town attorney cannot be used if you want to sell your bonds;

—Consult bond counsel early since he must approve all proceedings relative to the bond issue including all notices, resolutions, adoptions and/or approvals by boards and offering circulars. In fact, I virtually hire bond counsel many times in advance of drafting of bond proposals. Their assistance is invaluable. May I repeat, a legal opinion concerning public financing is a very specialized field of law and should not be undertaken by a firm inexperienced in this area.

Financial advice—Here again, the same theme prevails. Select competent advisors to help guide you through the maze of considerations surrounding the issuance of bonds or notes.

Let us look at some of the considerations:

1. The timing of the sale—Is it a favorable market?
2. The date of sale—Is it a holiday or does it conflict with a major national sale or sales (100 million of California and 50 or 60 million of Connecticut)?
3. Presentation to the rating agencies—What kind of information do they require?
4. Preparing the prospectus—Is it clear and concise?
5. Setting the maturity schedule—Are the dates convenient for investors? Is the schedule reconcilable with the flow of cash or resources?
6. Details of handling the sale—Is it a place convenient for bidders and is there a local proxy agent that can submit bids telephoned from the money centers (New York, Chicago, San Francisco, etc?)

I could go on at length, but instead I would highly recommend the reference booklet covering this area, "Pitfalls in Issuing Public Bonds" published by Moody's Investors Service, Inc.

In conclusion, I hope my message is clear enough—As you operate in the five principle areas of concern to public finance officials, you should carefully (A) consider the scope and limit of your responsibility and authority, and (B) seek competent advice, both legal and financial.

I am cognizant that I have not created many financial wizards in 15 minutes, but if any one of you is elected or appointed in a financial responsibility, I would be most happy to offer you several weeks of training in my office.

I purposely have avoided the topic of taxation, for we are indeed fortunate to have two experts in that field on the panel. I trust that I have aroused some curiosity and stimulated some interest, for questions will be most welcomed.

'...Services and Benefits...'

Theodore A. Jones, director of revenue of Illinois, spoke on "Problems of Revenue Administration" on the revenue and taxation panel Dec. 13. He is former regional director of the Office of Economic Opportunity for the Great Lakes Region and is a director of several financial institutions in Chicago.

I am deeply honored by your invitation. I am here, of course, as the representative of my state government's most popular agency—the tax-collecting Department of Revenue.

I am particulary grateful for this opportunity of speaking to you because of your particular professional interest in public administration. You are in a position to provide heavy influence upon some of the enormously complex decisions which lie immediately ahead of us.

I believe that it is time to make a decision as to whether state government will continue as a responsive and responsible instrument of the public will—whether it will continue to meet its responsibilities, or whether it will, by default, shift those responsibilities onto the federal government and itself assume a somewhat passive and ceremonial role in solving the people's problems and in some instances, the role of a spoiler, denying service to disadvantaged citizens. Every state faces decisions on this order.

Mere words will not answer that question. We must answer it with actions, and unless we do answer it satisfactorily, history will supply answers we do not relish. Are state governments going to respond realistically to local needs while the federal government waxes ever stronger and all-pervading?

Our ability to carry out the responsibilities of government is measured in what Abraham Lincoln called "the legitimate object of government" and defined as "to do for the people what needs to be done, but which they cannot, by individual effort, do at all, or do so well, for themselves."

If we are to do these things, it seems to me that we will have to do some rearranging of our opinions—to rid ourselves of some of the folklore that has grown up around the acts of government and the collection of taxes.

Too often we hear government discussed as if it were a business, as if it should be expected to make a profit and pay a dividend. This is utterly false. Government has no purpose as an institution other than the services and benefits it can provide for the people, better than they can do it for themselves.

Too often we forget that our democratic representative government was set up by inspired non-conformists expressly to provide services and benefits which they believed were justly due to the people, and which they had despaired of securing under colonial government.

If government is not created to "serve," what then is its purpose?

You cannot divorce state taxes from the federal and local taxes in preparing a program. They all come out of the same pocket, including your pocket and mine. In dealing with revenues, we must consider the total impact of all taxes, federal, state, and local, including those new ones which may be proposed.

In and of themselves, taxes are sterile. They have no real meaning except in terms of the payments of past debts or the purchase of services—paying workmen for their labor, and contractors for their work, materials for industry and goods bought and used by the state.

When Chief Justice John Marshall, in McCulloch vs. Maryland, said that "the power of tax involves the power to destroy," he laid the groundwork of a mischievous folklore that all taxes are, per se, bad because they will be abused. Had he said "the power to tax, carried to the extreme," he would have been much more precise.

The power of tax involves much more than John Marshall said: It involves the power to maintain responsible government, to provide police protection, health and education, highways and transportation facilities, schools and airports and sewage systems, hospitals and medical services—the things that Abraham Lincoln had in mind, and the things that the people, who own the government, want and are determined that they shall have.

Levying, collecting and expending taxes is not an exercise of futility and self-destruction. It is a function of maintaining those very services which ensure the permanence of democratic government and which are closest to the people and their needs.

It is in this area of services that the states are shifting the responsibility over to the federal government.

I should like to say parenthetically here that there is a very good reason why the federal government has been able to assume responsibilities that belong to the states, and that the states haven't been able to meet. The federal Constitution, liberally construed over the years, confers vast, indeed almost unlimited powers in its clauses on the general welfare, commerce, and taxing power. State governments, Illinois being a prime example, operate under constitutions that for the most part are narrowly drafted, unduly restrictive, and narrowly construed. Hence you have the paradox of the remote government being given virtually unlimited powers while those governments closest to the people are handcuffed and rendered incapable of meeting their historic responsibilities; or providing cover for state inefficiencies and for state administrators to deny equal treatment for disadvantaged citizens.

The "tax climate," which we hear so much about, cannot be divorced from the total business climate. I assume that everyone wants to maintain a business climate that is healthy and vigorous and full of opportunity.

Andrew Mellon, when he was Secretary of the Treasury, gave us a guideline that is still relevant. He said:

> "A sound tax policy must lessen, so far as possible, the burden of those least able to bear it; and it must remove those influences which might retard the continued steady development of business and industry on which, in the last analysis, so much of our prosperity depends."

It seems clear to me that at certain strategic points, many state tax systems fail utterly to measure up to those standards. We can agree that good taxes should, then, have certain characteristics: They should hold reasonable promise of being stable sources of revenue; they should be uniformly levied so that everyone shares in supporting the government; they should be easy to collect and hard to evade; they should be levied according to ability to pay.

And, above all, they should be levied on the other fellow!!

I think we can agree, too, that if every man could build his own hospital, his own school, his own highway and transport system, clean his own river, dispose of his garbage and sewage, act as his own policeman, install his own street lights and pave his own street—we then wouldn't need taxes at all!

Let us consider briefly what is occurring in some areas of historic state and federal responsibility.

Increasingly, in some states, the federal government has been called upon to restore law and order and here and there to provide some justice. Here, we must move as rapidly as possible with every resource available, to erase the social and economic conditions which produce mass disorders. Maintenance of respect for law is a primary and historic state responsibility which all too often has not been exercised well, if at all. All government has responsibility here.

No responsibility rests more squarely upon the state than that of providing for education, and our plight is desperate. It is desperate statewide and most critical in cities. School administrators everywhere are faced with the urgent need to find money to carry out programs that must be undertaken.

I would like to note an example of the wide variation in the quality of education contained in the report of the Illinois Scholarship Commission last year. Of the high school students enrolled in City of Chicago senior classes, 22.4 per cent of those eligible to compete for scholarships did so. But only 5.5 per cent of the total eligible were actually qualified for scholarships. For the state as a whole 23.4 per cent of senior classmen entered the competition, and 7.1 per cent qualified for scholarships. For Cook County suburban schools, 29.3 per cent of senior classmen competed, and 10.1 per cent qualified for scholarships.

What does this mean? It means that City of Chicago seniors fall significantly behind the state level and very far behind the suburban level of education, as indicated in the grading for scholarships. Educators will tell you that other factors (environment, economic pressures, family and community disturbances) may affect the student's performance. But the conclusion that a gigantic educational effort must be made in the city and the state is inescapable.

We may congratulate ourselves in Illinois that we have unexcelled prosperity and an unemployment rate of only 3 per cent, which is far below the level of other industrial states. But do not be misled by generalizations on this theme. Averages are tricky.

In the Lawndale area of Chicago, 17 per cent of adult males are without jobs, and 12 per cent in the Woodlawn area are unemployed. In some sections unemployment among Negro youth is 30 per cent or higher. It is dangerously high in many of the poorer white sections. These are the drop-outs, the aged, the uneducated and untrained who are unemployable in a highly technological economy. They are the elements of what Dr. James Conant called a "time bomb" in our midst.

Dr. Phillip Hauser, sociologist at the University of Chicago Center for Urban Studies, has said, "All of the welfare and educational provisions today are only a band-aid on a gaping, massive wound." (Time Magazine, July 28, 1967).

Gunnar Myrdal, the eminent Swedish economist, in his recent study of our economy, says: "In society at large there is more equality of opportunity today than there ever was. But for the bottom layer there is less or none."

These people, and many others, are telling us that despite our booming economy, our good intentions and our efforts thus far, we must find ways to give great numbers of sorely disadvantaged persons—some one-sixth of our population—a chance to learn, an opportunity to gain skills, a way to find some gainful work. We must find ways to help them break the chains in which they but barely exist—the cycle of unemployment, the relief roll, the broken family, the loss of faith, the loss of motivation, adult and juvenile crime.

Training and education and new approaches and methods of training are the major factors in accomplishing this goal. It is—I would like to point out—the only means by which we shall insure that in the future, business and industry and government will be able to find men and women with the technological (or scientific) skills that are needed to maintain our competitive advantages. Before the world, I doubt that there is a person present here today who could not add at least a score of other major problems of our states and cities that call for emergency measures.

There are social and economic costs attached to any policy of "too little, too late" carried on in the name of "economy in government." What are some of the costs?

Tax values are destroyed on a massive scale as whole vast areas of property decay into slums.

Clients for the relief rolls are manufactured at an expanding rate, and the tax burdens thereby increase.

Families are destroyed, by the hundreds and thousands, as social units.

Crime and juvenile delinquency and police and court costs fall into a vicious spiral of inflation.

Relationships between the individual and the surrounding society, and between the individual and his government, are eroded.

Human dignity is emasculated.

When I see these things, I ask myself if we can afford not to undertake that which is needed. Will not the eventual cost of inaction be far the greater?

58.6 per cent of Illinois' general revenue fund in the last biennium came from the so-called sales tax. 27 per cent of our total revenue came from the federal government. The 1967 increase in the sales tax—to 5 per cent—undoubtedly makes it one of the most regressive levies in the nation.

Our tax excludes a very wide range of proper objects of taxation: Our combined state-local rate is among the highest in the nation, and it rests most heavily on the food and clothing necessities purchased by those with the larger families—namely the poor.

It is clear that if federal grants and other payments were withdrawn, Illinois, as would all states, overnight would be in a colossal financial crisis. You cannot pull 27 per cent out of any revenue system without producing chaos.

A word about Federal Domestic Assistance. Shift is one major characteristic, most notable from federal to local city direct relationships rather than through state control and reallocation. OEO was the leader here followed by HUD, the Department of Labor and now some HEW programs.

U.S. Aid as Percentage of State Budgets 28 per cent in 1966.

Ala.	36%	Miss.	32%
Alaska	52%	N.C.	23%
Arkansas	36%	S.C.	23%
Fla.	22%	Tenn.	31%
Ga.	29%	Texas	28%
Ky.	31%	Va.	28%
La.	28%

Ninety-three per cent of the Governors believe that federal aid has stimulated state activity; 70 per cent believe it has improved state standards, and 35 per cent believe it has produced interference with state affairs. (This was in 1948).

With the partial shift from state control mentioned earlier, I believe many more will now claim interference—witness the new drive for block, unrestricted grants to states, sharing of income tax, etc.

With this shift has come a massive increase in federal grant programs:

1. War on Poverty—heavy local participation
2. Twenty-one basic education measures by Congress—1964-68
3. Fifteen vocational education and manpower bills
4. Four mass transit programs
5. Twenty major health statutes
6. Thirteen housing and urban development bills

In all about 219 new grant-in-aid programs with cost are going from $3 billion in 1960 to $20 billion in 1968-69.

With some imagination and firm resolutions we could do a much better and much fairer job of raising the revenues needed for schools, roads, welfare, training, housing and other purposes.

The more you involve yourselves in these matters, the more likely we are to devise a tax system that is fair and just and sufficient to our needs. Give leadership and participate.

President Roosevelt, who had to wrestle with unprecedented domestic problems and a depression of calamitous severity, proved to us that new thinking and new methods are required in meeting new challenges. I recall that he once said that, "Taxes are the price of breathing the free air of a free country, the price of a living and not a dead world."

'...Our Real Dream...'

Paul Anthony, executive director of the Southern Regional Council, greeted U. S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark and the black elected officials at the banquet Dec. 13.

It is with misgivings that I appear on the program this evening. Long dinners and the involvement of many people serve no function other than that of boring our guests.

However, in the next several moments, it is both a privilege, and certainly a pleasure, to do two things.

First, on behalf of the Southern Regional Council I should like to express our appreciation to Attorney General Ramsey Clark for being with us this evening. There is good in the South and there is good in the nation. This audience, Mr. Attorney General, represents a significant part of the good and the promise in this region. And the Attorney General, ladies and gentlemen of the audience, represents the good and the honorable of this nation. It is important, most important, that we meet here tonight recognizing this.

Secondly, and again on behalf of the Southern Regional Council, I should like, belatedly, to welcome the black elected officials of the South to this meeting and to thank you for coming. This is, as I am sure you agree, an historic occasion, and Atlanta is the appropriate site for it. Earlier, we have gone from "Gone with the Wind" to the Cotton States Exposition. At that latter event, of course, Dr. Washington attempted to make peace with the white South for "his people." I do not demean Dr. Washington, I hurt for him and the choices he faced.

The black elected officials here tonight give proof that now we are privileged to have new choices, and I rejoice that we do. The Southern Regional Council has for 20 years had a strong interest in access to the ballot, we have developed a sound reputation for our knowledge on this subject, and we have consistently expressed our faith in the power of the ballot. (And we are pleased that our current Voter Education Project is our most ambitious and successful effort to date in this area.)

Yet, for all the encouragement, pleasure and, indeed, honest rejoicing that this gives us of the Southern Regional Council, we, too, are sad. I am sad that in 1968 we should need a conference of black elected officials. For the Southern Regional Council to have such a conference is a confirmation that we are right, particularly in believing in the democratic society. We are gratified that this represents such a significant movement up the rungs of the ladder. But, we shall not be really gratified until we have climbed the ladder. We shall achieve our real dream in cooperation with men like the Honorable Ramsey Clark and that which he represents, and with the cooperation of the honorable black elected officials here present. This dream is to have a conference of elected officials.

Then we will all be blessed, whole, and a nation of honor.

UTHWIDE CONFERENCE OF
ACK ELECTED OFFICIALS

'... Equal Justice To All of Its People...'

Ramsey Clark, retiring Attorney General of the United States, was speaker Dec. 13 at a banquet at the American Motor Hotel. He is a native of Texas and the son of former U.S. Supreme Court Justice Tom C. Clark. He came to the Justice Department in March, 1961 after his appointment by President John F. Kennedy as assistant attorney general.

I wish there were some way that I could tell you how deeply pleased I am to be with you tonight. My reasons fall into three groups: One is personal. I am Southern and white, and I know how very desperately we need black elected officials here.

Second is official. I have been awfully fortunate through all my life, but during no time have I been so fortunate as these last years that I have had the opportunity to serve justice. There are many, many men and women who have been in the Department of Justice these years who should be here tonight; and they would be, as am I, deeply pleased to be here and to know what you represent for this nation.

We are here tonight because we are a democracy and a democracy that will ultimately extend equal justice to all of its people. We are here tonight because we are making progress toward that end. We are making progress because we care. I well remember the long nights in the Department of Justice in the winter of 1964 when we were trying to find the legal techniques for a voting rights act. I well remember President Johnson's deep personal commitment to liberating the Negro, the minority in America; to bring the vote to all Americans.

As the principal federal officer in charge of the enforcement of the federal court order under which the march from Selma to Montgomery took place in the spring of '65, I had the privilege to see great men—brave men, men who believed in America—march that we might be here tonight. Dr. Martin Luther King was in the front rank. Bob Kennedy, who had been Attorney General, contributed there in the early days toward the Voting Rights Act. Men like Nick Katzenbach, Burke Marshall and John Doar were there and did what they could with their might.

Then there was that moment, Aug. 6, 1965, when the rotunda of the nation's Capitol was filled with the nation's great, and the President of the United States signed the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and it became the law of the land. It was less than a week later that the first deep rumbles from South-Central Los Angeles in an area called Watts—originally a bus depot, the first stop in Los Angeles County from the Southern states—were felt throughout the world; and we were reminded how imperative it is that we persevere.

I am deeply honored to be here for a third reason: to be with black elected officials of the South because I am a concerned American; because I know there are thousands and thousands of people in these United States who have come to doubt and some who do not believe, that this nation has either the purpose or the capability to bring equal justice to all of its citizens (and you demonstrate, better than anything perhaps, that this is not so); that the system, however awkward, however slow, can work; that our purpose as a people and the purpose of our laws is equality and justice for all.

The Voting Rights Act is a bold experiment in democracy. It has made a difference. Four years ago we could have held this meeting in the telephone booth in the lobby and not interfered with anybody who wanted to make a phone call. Two years ago in Washington, the leadership—as I recall, Louis Martin, primarily—met with what was comparatively a handful of black elected officials from all over the nation. What a difference you can make! What a difference that law has made and must make further, because we are only beginning. We have miles to go before we sleep.

The Voting Rights Act of 1965, like every contested piece of legislation, has compromises. One compromise was the expiration of many of the most important sanctions and controls—in what then seemed a long time and now seems no time. After five years, on Aug. 8, 1970, there will be the opportunity for jurisdictions to reinstate qualifications to vote through subjective tests, such as literacy. Then, unless something is done, the power of the Department of Justice to place examiners and observers in places where they are needed to protect the fundamental right of a democratic people will also expire. Then state legislatures will be empowered to prescribe new standards, new procedures for voting throughout this land.

It seems imperative to me that we redouble our efforts today to enlist in the support of democracy, under the auspices of the Voting Rights Act and this great Voter Education Project, all of our people and that we provide for the future by extending these sanctions of the Voting Rights Act of '65 for yet years to come. Their necessity, to me, seems clear.

I would not be fair if I said that voting, the right to vote, the exercise of that right, is the entire solution. Far, far from it. It is terribly important, it vests power. You now have new power; you must cherish it and nourish it, and build it, and increase it, and exercise it for justice. But if it were the entire solution, then how would we explain the conditions of Central City America, of our great metropolitan areas—of a New York and a Chicago and a Los Angeles?

We must go forward, seriously, on many fronts and with rare courage—the rare courage that you black elected officials have shown us and of which I am grateful. We know the areas. We sometimes think because the struggle is so difficult that, perhaps, the road isn't clear; but it is.

Separate, but equal, was never so; could not be; will never be. There can be no equality with separation in any society, least of all in a highly urban and complex nation of two hundred million such as ours. Separation must be ended, and all of its manifestations, to bring equality. The task is terribly difficult.

An area is education. Start with the children. Education is America's greatest industry. One in three in this country is engaged, full time, in education as student, teacher or administrator. In 1954, May 17—a time had begun so much, so late—the Supreme Court said, as to public schooling, there can be no separation. For nine years, through litigation in the courts of the South, the constitutional rights of our citizens were litigated. In September, 1963, those who knew saw one per cent of the Negro children in the public schools of the 11 states of the Confederacy in schools that were desegregated. All deliberate speed meant nine centuries.

People with vision saw this. People of determination changed it, in large measure, because of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, because of Title VI, because of the much-maligned guidelines of the Office of Education promulgated in conformity with law thereunder. One per cent in '63 became 16 per cent in '67. When the returns are in, it will surely be over 20 per cent in '68. This, a law that has had barely three years to work its way, has made a major difference and has shown that the constitutional rights of our citizens in the South can be fulfilled.

Because of the immensity of this nation, and while we concentrated here where the need was so great, we barely noticed the new segregation building up steadily and swiftly in urban America.

In five short years, from 1950-1955, the percentage of Negro children in the public schools of Baltimore increased from 50 to 61. In St. Louis, it was from 49 to 60. In Chicago, from 42 to 50. A profound change reflecting patterns of living meant a new segregation in Central City America unless we awoke. The 25 largest school districts in the United States saw a shift in five short years in the percentage of Negro children in public schools of nearly 10 per cent—10 per cent more Negro children and 10 per cent fewer white. America cannot stand that.

Slowly the resources of the law are brought to bear; and now four suits, outside the South, are brought to desegregate our schools there. And soon, soon we must recognize, among other things, that the litigations that take so long and the guideline techniques that can work so well must be brought to bear elsewhere. And soon, we must recognize that segregation in schooling is incompatible with our principles and, alas, I believe, with the Constitution, whatever the cause.

On the forefront today, we are moving in the area of employment, and only beginning. There is vast discrimination in employment—the opportunity to get a job, to keep a job, to improve in your job, to get a better job. The '64 Act, Title VII promised to remedy this. It's essential that we enlist all of our energies, as a people, to do it. Today, we have brought finally 34 suits. When you think of the immense industry of the United States, you see how very slow the beginning is. Twenty-four this year, with so far to go.

One reason you must understand. For all the might of the federal government, the resources that we, as a people, have provided there are terribly inadequate. The Civil Rights Division—as devoted a group of people to the principles of this country as has ever been collected in one place, with one mission, in my judgment—is fewer than a hundred lawyers. Their average age is under 30. Their burden is to enforce the Voting Rights Act, to litigate school desegregation in perhaps 30,000 school districts over the U. S., to bring Title II of the Act, promising open accommodation, to a reality; to enforce all of our Civil Rights Laws. This small resource would be inadequate for one state. It would be inadequate for one single law throughout the United States. We must look to you, in your local community, to generate commitment and action to bring equality.

The reasons that black and white in America must show the world that they can live together with respect, with stability and with love are many. One is human dignity—my dignity, your dignity. Another is to remove this gross imperfection from our national character, to show that we can be what we say we are.

But there is another. It is survival. It really is, you know. We will add on this planet, in the next decade, one billion souls, and most will be blacks and browns and yellows. And we are impelled by change so vast that, in a few short years, the fundamental way we live is more greatly altered than in history to this moment. And change means that millions will starve, and millions will live in more than affluence, amidst surfeit, more than they can use. It means that science and technology, with 90 per cent of the scientists who ever lived working today, accelerating change and population explosions, compel now equality. And if we do not demonstrate that it is possible, that it can be, that it is, here in America, black and white together with love and strength, then this poor, tired world has more ahead than it can handle.

In the Gospel according to St. Mark, it is said, "And if a house be divided against itself, then that house cannot stand." America is a house divided. Not yet irreconcilably, but that remains possible. The divisions are many. Never forget that. It may be hard for black America to realize that our divisions are many—the young and the old, a real division.

Of course every generation has had a gap. But the gap today is greater than ever before and for clearly ascertainable reasons—because change is so vast; because in a few short years, there is such a difference that a generation today exceeds the millenium in times gone by. Half the buildings in the world have been built in the last 30 years; half the buildings in Harlem were built before 1900, and there's a moral there.

There is a division today between the educated and the uneducated. It's a very profound division. Education means more to the individual today than ever before. My father and his brothers could come to be lawyers without going to college, without going to law school. The demands of our terribly complex, technologically advanced society compel constant increase in education. Forty-five percent of the college-age people today are in college. When I started college after World War II, there were a million and a half students; today there are over seven. The difference between the policemen endeavoring to control college students—the policemen five to 10 years older, who dropped out before completing the eighth grade—is immense. We have to recognize that division. We have to seek to bridge it.

There is a division between the rich and the poor. It is not the same division that has existed in bygone days between rich and poor because, today, the poor know of the wealth that surrounds them. Today, in America, the poor are a minority. To be poor in urban America is to be desperate. And in that desperation, you see Marlboro country on T.V., and you know it doesn't look like 126th Street. You must bridge the gap between rich and poor.

There are these gaps within races too. You must know Negro youth in this country. You must work very closely with them. They need your strength and wisdom. You need theirs. And if you can't bridge that gap, the meaning is immense to all of our people. And you must, within races and between, bridge the gap between the educated and the uneducated and lift all to the greatest possible education we can bring to them, because their future and ours depends on it, and so, too, the rich and poor.

And finally, of course, there's the division between black and white, a division that cannot and must not continue.

And from one side of this house of ours, we hear the call for order. There must be order. And from the other side of the house comes the cry of justice. Give us justice. The long history of mankind tells us that you will have neither order nor justice until you have both.

'. . . Proud To Have Been a Part . . .'

(TELEGRAM FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES)

Four years ago, only a handful of black people held public office in the South. Negroes were, in effect, without a direct voice in the council of government in the Southland.

Soon after this administration began, I had the honor of signing into law the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Hundreds of thousands of Southern Negroes who had been denied the ballot were able, for the first time in their lives, to register and to vote. Indeed, Negro registration in the South has increased by one million in the last four years, to a total of more than three million today. Those black Southerners are today, for the first time, able to participate in the most basic step in our democracy—the casting of the ballot on election day.

Largely because of this historic development, there are now some 385 black elected officials—all holding public offices for which they had to go before the voters—in the South. These officials now are gathered in a conference sponsored by the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council to discuss their mutual problems, to exchange ideas and to receive advice and counsel on the performance of their public duties.

As President of the United States, I salute these black men and women now meeting in Atlanta. I wish their conference much success. I am proud to have been a part of the developments that made it possible for them to serve.

A Resolution: '... Not Separate, But Unequal ...'

The following resolution, drafted by a representative of each of the 11 Southern states, was adopted by the Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials as the conference ended Dec. 14.

We have come to a point in the South and in the nation where the executive decisions of the next four years may well determine the course of race relations and civil rights progress for the future and will decide whether the succeeding generations of America will live in peace or will live at all.

We are appalled by inferences from the incoming administration that the South's racial problems will be effectively dealt with by the states.

The fate and future of the South and her people, black and white, cannot be left in the hands of these leaders whose past failures have demonstrated their inability and unwillingness to build a new South.

While business, acting unselfishly, can help, business alone will not bring enlightened, unselfish solutions to this region's problems.

Rather, we, as members of city, county and state governments, believe in and depend on democratic government, responsive to the needs of our constituents and the unrepresented millions of the South, as the proper problem-solving agency of the 20th Century.

We hope that the traditional Southern divisions between class and race can be healed. The kinds of oppressed whites who have had their own interests subverted by their racism must join with the oppressed blacks whom we represent to build a new South.

What is needed more than all else is full implementation of the Civil Rights Acts of 1964 and 1968, the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and the Economic Opportunity Act. This can be done only by full dedication of the Executive, Legislative and Judicial branches of federal and state government to the rights of man. The United States Supreme Court and our federal judiciary must be upheld and strengthened in devotion to equal justice.

We want to urge the President of the United States and our Congress to extend the much needed Voting Rights Act of 1965 from its present maturity date to another five years.

Since 1965, 805,233 Negroes have been added to voter registration rolls in the 11 Southern States. Most notable gains have come in those states where federal registrars have been assigned. To date, however, none have been assigned to either North Carolina or Virginia. Registrars are needed in these two states, and additional federal registrars are needed throughout the whole South.

In a nation dedicated to democratic principles, how can we explain that only about 60 per cent of the nation's potential voters went to the polls in the November election? Consideration should be given to making election day a national holiday so that the people can have adequate time to exercise the right to vote, so dearly earned by so many, over so long a period of time.

Violence and intimidation—as the tragic events at Orangeburg, S. C., earlier this year illustrated—have not abated in the South. White resistance to school desegregation continues—as we have seen in South Carolina and Mobile, Ala., and many other places, where white parents have organized to block effective progress toward eliminating the dual school system. In the 14 years since the Brown decision outlawing segregated public education, the rate of school integration in the South still hovers at a low level of tokenism. According to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare figures for the 1967-68 school year, only 14 per cent of the South's black children were enrolled in desegregated schools. For the Deep South the figures were: Alabama, 5.4 per cent; Mississippi, 3.9 per cent; South Carolina, 6.4 per cent; Louisiana, 6.7 per cent, and Georgia, 9.9 per cent.

The critical problem of poverty in the South must not be ignored by the new administration. In spite of much national publicity, children are still hungry in Mississippi and throughout the South. In spite of national concern over technological unemployment, men are still being driven from the land to huddle in the slums of our large cities. As critical as the problem of technological unemployment is the depressing reality of widespread under-employment. In many areas of the South the percentage of the labor force designated "unemployed" is about the national average, but the income in those areas is less than half the national average. Southerners, black and white, work long hours for low pay. Minimum wage laws must be broadened and enforced.

As part of a short-term solution to some of the more critical problems of the poor, uniform federal regulations are needed to govern the administration of public assistance programs in the states. Under present state welfare structures it is possible for states to impose restrictive regulations which bar the most needy from welfare rolls. However, the concept of public assistance itself needs to be re-evaluated with the understanding that welfare is not a privilege bestowed upon the needy in the way of charity, but a clear legal right. Hand in hand with such a re-evaluation, additional jobs and job training programs must be created.

We want to thank the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council for bringing us together and giving us the tools and techniques we need to improve our performance as elected officials.

As more of us take office and as we become more deeply involved in the problems of our constituencies, gatherings like this one, on regional, state and local levels, must be continued to help us keep abreast of the complexities of modern government.

Events of the past four years in the nation's alienated black ghettos should have taught us that the just and human needs of the country's black minority cannot be ignored, or appeased with high-sounding words. We are not yet a nation separate, but we are most assuredly a nation unequal.

'... The Polling Place Is the New Phase ...'

Mrs. Shirley Chisholm of New York, whose luncheon speech closed the Southwide Conference Dec. 14, was elected Nov. 5 as the first Negro Congresswoman in history. Elected from Brooklyn's Bedford-Stuyvesant district, she had previously served in the state Assembly.

Those of you who know me know that I am very forthright and very frank. And so I am not going to be giving you a lot of little pieces of dessert this afternoon. I'm going to tell it to you like it is, because we've got to realize that we are going through a very important social revolution in this country.

Someone made a reference a little bit earlier to the fact that we had women on the stage. Perhaps this might be ladies afternoon or ladies evening. I want to be very sincere when I say to you that there is a tremendous need for women to be in the political arena. I would hope, in the near future, that we would not pay so much attention as to whether a person is male or female, but that we would rather look at the assets and the attributes of those people who can help to liberate our race eventually. I think that must be the criteria.

Yes, from February through Nov. 5 of this year, I have been at it in the streets. And there were so many whisperings going on that "you can't make it because you are a woman." Well, ladies and gentlemen, here I am!

While nothing is easy for the black man in America, neither is anything impossible. Like all men, rather, we are moving along, and we will continue to move resolutely until our goal of complete and unequivocal equality is obtained. We must not be docile. We must not be resigned or inwardly bitter. We must see ourselves in an entirely new perspective, and we cannot sit in our homes waiting for someone to reach out and do things for us. Every tomorrow has two hands—the hand of fate or the hand of anxiety. And the first battle is won, my brothers and sisters, when we fight for belief in ourselves and find that it has come to us.

While we are still battling, we must not allow petty things to come to us and stimulate them into vast proportions of evil. To dwell on every slight and clutch it close to our breasts and nourish it will corrode our thinking. We are on the move now, and as Frederick Douglass said, "Power concedes nothing without a struggle. It never has and it never will." And the United States can no longer afford the luxury of costly, morally, religiously and ethically wrong racial discrimination. For America needs all of its citizens, with the ability to develop, to make a fuller contribution.

Many problems scream loudly—the thousands of black citizens, with franchise, living under degrading conditions; the millions of poor throughout this affluent nation, white and black, who lack the bare rudiments for fruitful living; the rapidly growing numbers of children caught in a web of disillusionment which destroys their will to learn, the increasing number of aged who do not look forward to rest or to retirement. And despite the historic legislation of our cities and our states, nearly 11 million black citizens today still live in basic ghetto communities of our cities.

From decades of non-participation, or only modest participation, the black man has, within only the last four years, shifted his goal to full political participation for full American citizenship. While on the picket line, at the lunch counter, and in the bus and store boycotts, the black man came face to face with the full breadth and weight of the power and influence exercised by local and state government, intertwining with and often stifling the protest. Indeed, a principle by-product of the American civil rights movement has been the election of the black citizen to his awesome political potential. And just as the picket line and the lunch counter demonstrations and the boycotts were dramatic and effective weapons of protest for the civil rights movement, the polling place, my friends, is the new phase and new thrust of the Negroes' bid for equality of opportunity.

Power concedes nothing. How else can any man rise to power and hold sway over millions and tens of thousands except by smothering dissenting voices? Freedom is an endless horizon and there are many roads that lead to it. We must walk arm in arm with other men, and we must struggle towards goals which are commonly desired and sound. We must give and lend to the youth a stronger voice and encourage their individuality. We must look to the schools and work for their improvement. The leaders of today in the black community must be able to place the goal of freedom ahead of personal ambition. The truly dedicated leader follows his conscience, tells what is best for his people.

Whatever else the black man is, he is American. Whatever he is to become—integrated, unintegrated, or disintegrated—he will become it in America. Only a minority of blacks has ever succumbed to the temptation to seek greener pastures in another country or another ideology. The black man's total commitment to America indicates that the prospects ahead seem bright. It is true that we are angry about our present plight, for we measure this country by her potential rather than by her achievements.

And Black Power is, indeed, a reality that is gaining in emotional intensity, if not always rational clarity. The harnessing and solidification of Afro-American power is constantly being dissipated with factionalism. Internal struggle for power by one group over another and forgetting the masses—this behavior is no different from that of the whites. But we as a people cannot afford the luxury of fighting among ourselves if we are to make real progress in this country.

Black people will gain only as much as they can win through their ability to organize independent bases of economic and political power through boycotts, electoral activities, rent strikes, etc. Black Power is concerned with organizing the rage of black people and is putting new, hard questions and demands to white America. We will build a new sense of community amongst our people. We will foster a bond between those who have made it and those on the bottom. And as Mr. Hamilton says, "Alienation will be overcome, and trust, the thing that our people are looking for, trust, will be restored."

Let us remember that a great people are not affected by each puff of wind that blows ill. We must fight for belief in ourselves. And, above all, we must hearken back to the days of darkness when Frederick Douglass, the great abolitionist, even in those times, echoed the famous phrase that has come, realistically, to haunt the black people in America as they fight to enter the mixed stream of political and economic life in these United States, the land of their birth. And that phrase is, "Power concedes nothing."

Let me say to you, my brothers and sisters, that until we can organize to create black unity with an economic base, until we can develop a plan for action to achieve the goals to make us totally independent and not have to look to The Man in order to live, we are not liberated. We must become doers and producers in this system in order to be able to control our destiny. We have the potential, but we must consolidate all of our strength for eventual liberation.

And let me say, off the cuff, a few things that are beating in my breast.

As I travel around the country now, speaking to groups, I must share these things. During my congressional campaign in Brooklyn I had the opportunity to talk with many of the black and white students on the various campuses; and to a large extent, many of these students came in and were a vital part of my campaign. And one of the things that these students, both black and white, indicated to me: Mrs. Chisholm, you have become a new symbol; a new kind of politician that is emerging. And I would ask them to elaborate on what the statement meant. Listen, this is what young people are saying in this country. They say you represent the type of politician that the people can trust implicitly; the type of politician that will not exploit their people for personal self-aggrandizement; the type of politician that is unbought and unbossed.

Those of you who have been following my career ever since I emerged five years ago know that the symbol under which I have operated is unbought and unbossed, and I think you can understand when I say to you that this does not endear me to the political structure. For I have the courage of my convictions. If you are truly going to give your people a sense of direction and a sense of leadership, you have to be able to relate to the people only and be prepared to take the consequences as a result of your actions, because this is what black people are looking for in America today.

They are disillusioned, they are apathetic, and there are many more reasons why many of our people don't go to the polls in spite of all of the barriers that have been held against them, particularly in the Southern part of this country. Many of them don't go to the polls because the public officials that they put in office forget them when they get in office. And we cannot afford that luxury. Yet, people have said to me ever since I emerged four years ago, you are committing political suicide, because I refused to do things for political expediency. When I should leave this scene, I want to be remembered, not as the first black woman to go to the United States Congress, although this is a historical fact. I want to be remembered as a politician that entered the arena where the people had real hope, not in terms of the words that I mouth day to day, but in terms of my actions and my attitudes in my community. That is what I want to be remembered for.

Yes, it was a very tough struggle, a very hard struggle this year. First in the primary of June I was up against the most popular state senator, another woman. The senator was The Man's "boy," because in the meeting they had indicated, "Yes, Mrs. Chisholm has ability; yes, Mrs. Chisholm is a fighter; but you can't cope with the woman." It isn't a question of coping with the woman, it's a question of trying to manipulate my conscience and dictate to my mind what I must do. And I said then—and I continue to say it—I know a person that's fiery and independent-minded in the political arena, I know that their days may be shortened. But I am not going to worry about that. Fortunately for me, I have a theory that many people don't accept. And maybe many of the people in this room will not accept it. But I believe this theory on the basis of my political activity for 20 years behind the scenes—only having emerged five years ago. The black people in America must have leadership that for the most part is educationally and/or financially secure. Because the temptations that are placed in the paths of many of us, many of us are not strong enough to resist.

I think that if we understand these basic things, then we can hope to restore some faith in our people. They will go to the polls, the registration drives will be increased because of the fact that their elected officials have indicated by their actions that they are fighting for them, that they are with them, that they are prepared to take the consequences of their actions. If we do this, I can assure you that the registration drives and the political activity during election time will become greater. But we have to prove this.

They told me that they could not back me for the United States Congress, even though the people in that community had last December come together and interviewed 11 others who were potential candidates. And the citizens had said we want Shirley Chisholm to go to Congress, because she has beaten the machine at the polls and the woman cannot be controlled, and we know that we can sleep at night when that woman's voice is in Washington. But the very assets that the people found in me I later learned were things that were against me politically, and hence the party boys did not give me the designation.

And of course, like many people, I suppose I should have stepped back, I should not have bothered, because I had four strikes against me. Number one, I was not a darling of the party. Number two, I was a woman. Number three, I was a black woman. And number four, I sure didn't have congressional money to run.

But you know what really made me decide to run? Not only the fact that I've always risen to challenges, but the fact that a woman came to my home on Sunday morning—I remember the state Legislature was still in session—that was way back in March. She came to my home one Sunday morning and rang the doorbell. I went downstairs and opened the door. I think I see her now. A very fat, middle-aged black woman, timidly entering my living room and pulling out of her pocketbook a crumpled, dirty white envelope. And I saw her taking this envelope out—it was kind of heavy—and as she extended it to me, she said, "Mrs. Chisholm you know, we welfare people hate you politicians because you're always fattening yourselves. We don't believe in helping you because so many of you forget about it. But Mrs. Chisholm, for the 10 years before you entered the political arena and for the four years that you have served in the state Legislature, when we learned in this community that you were going to run for the United States Congress, a group of us welfare mothers decided to get together and have our own little thing going each Friday night in order to raise some money to help you to buy stamps." And she gave me an envelope—I will never spend that money—the first contribution I got to my congressional campaign—$9.69 in coins.

If I had any doubts about running, that erased every doubt. I made my mind up that I had to run although many persons had cautioned me. They said, "Shirley, no one can run in your district against you for the state Assembly and win. That's your seat. You could stay there as long as you want to. Why are you giving up a sure thing to run for a congressional seat when you have so many odds against you. I said yes, I may have odds against me, but I have a little talk with the Man above each night, and I have a talk with the grassroots in the community, and they say, "Chisholm, run." And I ran. It was the toughest campaign that I've ever run in my life.

During the course of the campaign, right after I won the primary in June, I became ill. I had to go to the hospital to get an operation, and I was out of circulation for about seven weeks. My people became very concerned because my opponent was going up and down the district, and every day it would seem that he would be nearer and nearer to my door; and there was of course a certain amount of anxiety. But always deep down within me I knew that in spite of what was happening, I was going to win. Because I had indicated by my life, from the day I was born in that community, that I had served and worked with those people even before they ever thought of sending me to political office. And I knew that they would not forget. In spite of whomsoever the powers wanted to throw out there against me, I knew that the people would not forget me. Many workers came to my home as I lay on my bed trying to recuperate, and they were crying and upset. They said, "Chisholm you're so near to it, but yet so far, because the people in the district are saying they don't hear your voice on the soundtruck."

Ever since I have emerged I don't campaign indoors, I bring them out to the streets. Let the people dig you, let the people see you. And I believe in campaigning in the streets and in the housing projects and at the rallies. Because then this is where the truth and sincerity of everything comes out and you have to face that populace. You don't have to get away with gimmicks.

Finally, I said to my doctor—and he'd known me for a long time—I said, "Doc, I've got to go." He said "Shirley, I'm going to tell you, you have got to keep quiet for a while. I know that you're itching to go, but you've had an operation and you cannot use up your energy." And I remember so well that I said to him, "But Doc, the stitches aren't in my mouth, they're on my body." And he said, "Well, if you feel that you're strong enough to go out on your soundtrucks and tell the people your story, well, then you can go."

And believe it or not, the moment I got up to go into those streets until Nov. 5, I didn't even remember I had an operation. God is with me, and I went out in those streets and I did the kind of job that had to be done.

And now I know every eye is going to be focused on me. I went down to Washington last week for three days to look for a place to live, to hire a staff, to do a lot of odds and ends. And as I walked into the House of Representatives' restaurant, as I came down the steps, some of the members of the House of Representatives were eating; and I saw the elbows just hitting each other, as I came down the steps. Well, I guess you can imagine what was being said. And they came over, and one of them had the nerve to say to me, "You know, we heard all about you in New York, and we know you're a tough cookie, but we have been waiting for you. We're going to have some fun with you, Shirley Chisholm." And I said, "Sir, you must remember that fun doesn't necessarily work in one way. I'm going to have some fun with you, too."

And so, my dear brothers and sisters, I rise to the challenge of the awesome responsibility that has now been placed upon my shoulders, to be the first black woman to sit in the United States House of Representatives. And although I specifically represent the 12th Congressional District of New York State, I know that I am a voice for all of the blacks in America.

I don't know if many of you also realize that I was elected at the Democratic National Convention as the first black person to be a national committeewoman of New York State. I say this for one specific reason, because somebody said it to me a couple of weeks ago: "Shirley Chisholm, how can you rise within the ranks of the party so quickly, within a four-year period, from a poll leader all the way up to Congresswoman, and then go to the convention and emerge as a national committeewoman for the party—and yet you are not really a part of the machine?" And I said to the person, "Don't you recognize that the revolution is here, that the people are making their decisions now on the basis of what you can do to help liberate them?" And that's why I am rising. Because even though the bosses kept trying to stop me at the convention, when I ran in the district, the people kept telling them by their support, "Why don't you leave her alone?"

I think now that they recognize one thing about me, if nothing else. I love a good fight. And you don't tell me that you're going to try to destroy me without my attempting to show you what I can do with my 100-pound self.

God bless all of you. Pray for me, because I am going to need prayers. But one thing I do know, that the black people in this country will be very proud of their first black woman to go to Congress, because I'm going to live the life and fight the good fight. Because the time has come when we can no longer be the passive recipients of whatever the politics or the morals of a nation may decree, but that we shall rise up and fight for that which we believe.

Forget what the world will say, whether you're in your place or out of your place. Forget conventionalism. Speak your best words. Do your best deeds. Fight your best fight, looking only to God and to your conscience for approval.

RACES

The Other Half of the Battle

When Mrs. Geneva Collins took office as Chancery Clerk in Mississippi's Claiborne County, the two-member white staff quit. Mrs. Collins is black. Dan Nixon, a Negro magistrate in Brownsville, Tenn., was never informed of the date for the swearing-in ceremony after his election and had to seek out a local judge to be formally installed in office. Griffin McLaurin, a black constable in Tchula, Miss., has a problem with the white justice of the peace in his district. Says McLaurin: "When I bring someone in on a traffic charge, if it's a white man, he'll let him go. But if it's a Negro, he'll fine him."

Slowly and painfully, most of the 382 Negroes who have been elected to public offices in the South—ranging from mayor and state representative to constable and justice of the peace—have discovered that getting elected is only half the battle. Now, to help solve some of the problems facing Southern black officeholders, the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council has set up five campus service centers to provide basic training.* These centers hold workshops for potential candidates on legal requirements for filing, costs and techniques of campaigning, and their official duties. They also provide advice to those already in office and help black officials to research and introduce legislation.

Establishing Authority. Valuable as this assistance is, it is still the black officials themselves who must solve the problems of establishing their authority in a largely hostile white society. White intransigence to political integration takes many forms, ranging from defiance to outright intimidation. Black justices and constables are told by white offenders that "no nigger is going to tell us what to do." Moses Riddick, a member of the Board of Supervisors in Suffolk, Va., had a cross burned on his lawn after winning a primary. James Jolliff, a black constable in Wilkinson County, Miss., was arrested on charges of impeding and intimidating officers and was temporarily suspended from his office when he stopped Alcoholic Beverage Commission agents from searching a Negro cafeteria without a warrant.

In several Southern states local officials are paid on the "fee" system, according to the number of cases they handle. In towns where there is more than one justice of the peace, white officers can choose which J.P. they will bring minor offenders to for hearings. If one J.P. is black and the other white, the Negro official is simply ignored. William Childs, a black justice of the peace in Tuskegee, Ala., is one victim of this system. Childs charges that the white J.P. in his district averages 300 to 400 traffic cases a month, while he gets no more than 20.

Crisis of Identity. Frustrating and vicious as white resistance can be, it is only part of the problem. Many black officials are split over the question of whom they represent, often finding themselves in a crossfire between militant and moderate members of the Negro community, including many who feel that they should not have run in the first place. When A. W. Willis campaigned unsuccessfully for mayor of Memphis in 1967, his "real fight" was with the city's black community. His effort, he said, was undermined by Negroes "who felt that a black man had a nerve trying to be mayor," and by black militants who wanted to boycott the entire election. In Richmond, Va., two Negro councilmen were defeated for reelection when the black leadership supported two white liberals to replace them. Both the Negroes had supported a measure to increase city transportation fares, and one had voted against an open-housing regulation, arguing that the council was not empowered to pass such a measure.

The number of Negro-elected officials in the South has been rising steadily since the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and the surge is expected to continue. With it will grow the crisis of identity that blacks and whites must face in the South, and the problems will doubtless multiply. So, in the longer run, may the opportunities to root out discrimination. Says Dr. Samuel DuBois Cook, Negro professor of political science at Duke University: "Today, while it is true that the Negro still is part subject, it is also true that he is much nearer the start of political equality than at any previous time. He now has a toehold in the Southern political process. Negroes can help redeem the past. They can be liberating and redemptive agents. Black men, working with white men of reason, good will and a sense of justice, can largely free the South from the chains and illusions of the past."

Arkansas Labor Keys Dues Hike to Progress

Hot Springs, Ark.—Delegates to the Arkansas AFL-CIO's seventh convention approved an increase in per capita payments to continue the state body's "Program of Progress" and expand its legislative goals for the coming two years.

Approving the officers' recommendation to continue the seven-year-old program marked by "unprecedented progress in the face of great difficulties," the 300 delegates voted new two-year terms for Pres. J. Bill Becker and Sec.-Treas. E. J. Jacobs, and raised the monthly affiliation tax from 22.5 cents per member to 23 cents.

Since the Program of Progress was adopted, the state federation increased its dues-paying membership by 11,000 and achieved many of its objectives in the fields of legislation, political education, public relations and union cooperation, the officers said.

They listed these gains:

- An increase in unemployment insurance, voted by the legislature in 1963, when Arkansas became the first southern state to base maximum unemployment benefits on a percentage of the state's average wage.
- Passage in 1964 of a permanent voter registration law, initiated by labor and other groups and approved in a statewide referendum.
- Enactment of the first minimum wage law in state history.
- Passage in 1968 of a workmen's compensation law the federation called "the best in the South."

The federation also mounted a statewide campaign against an unfavorable unemployment insurance bill which the governor vetoed, won enactment of a state prevailing-wage law, secured a union dues deduction procedure for state employes, won exemption of the first $25 of wages from garnishment, and other goals including an increase in teachers' salaries.

Despite these gains, the officers reported, "many problems remain in the antiunion atmosphere" of a state that still is "saddled with a compulsory open shop law and records the second lowest per capita income" in the nation.

Convention speakers included Gov. Winthrop Rockefeller (R), Pres. Thomas F. Murphy of the Bricklayers, Sec.-Treas. William Botkin of the Woodworkers, Vice Pres. George T. Watkins of the Machinists, Vice Pres. Wayne E. Glenn of the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers, Rep. David Pryor (D-Ark.), Richard Shoemaker of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, and Al Kehrer of the federation's Dept. of Civil Rights.

Rockefeller urged an increase in the state sales tax, but the delegates voted to oppose it unless its "unfair effect" on the poor is removed. Murphy urged all unions to affiliate with state federations for their full membership—an objective he has asked all Bricklayer unions to achieve.

Becker announced the affiliation of the Chemical Workers for all its 1,800 Arkansas members.

Two Join Staff Of Research Dept.

Frank F. Pollara has been appointed assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research and Richard W. Humphreys has joined the department as an industrial engineer.

Pollara comes to the federation after 19 years with the Steelworkers where he was an international representative in charge of coordinated bargaining. He also served the USWA as assistant research director at one time and held posts on various human relations committees for the union.

Earlier, Pollara had been with the National Labor Relations Board, the Veterans Administration and the U.S. Employment Service.

Humphreys comes to the AFL-CIO from the University of West Virginia. He had been director of the university's Institute of Labor Studies and also headed its Manpower & Labor Studies Division.

From 1959 through 1967, Humphreys had been with the Allied Industrial Workers both as education and research director and as administrative assistant to the president. He also was with the State, County & Municipal Employes before serving on the University of Wisconsin staff, 1952-58.

School Official Named Deputy Mediation Chief

Dr. Lowell M. McGinnis, assistant superintendent of the Los Angeles public schools for employer-employe relations, has been named deputy director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. McGinnis, 55, has been the school system's chief negotiator with employe unions, FM&CS Dir. J. Curtis Counts said.

Black politicians chart new courses on civil rights

New views on the traditional political activity of Negroes were voiced last month in Washington at a meeting of black elected officials, most of whom serve at county and municipal levels.

The ideas that came out of the Institute of Black Elected Officials will help consolidate the civil rights struggle, which has been badly fragmented on a national level ever since the Southern sit-ins of the early 1960s.

Blacks with divergent viewpoints, among them, social psychologist Dr. Kenneth B. Clark and Georgia legislator Julian Bond, agreed that the power of Negro office-holders is growing. Clark calls them "the new cutting edge of the civil rights movement." Bond claims that "self-appointed" leaders of the past have been supplanted by "blacks chosen by the people." Both distinguish between the new breed of black officeholder and the old ward heeler.

Putting power to work

Two major ideas for exercising black political power emerged from the meeting, sponsored by Clark's Metropolitan Applied Research Center (MARC). Black officials would:

- Create a formal Washington pressure group to lobby for specific legislation and actively support political candidates.
- Form a clearinghouse to give technical and management aid to black elected officials. The center would be situated in Washington and probably affiliated with Howard University.

Financing an effective lobbying group would be difficult. Foundations, normally a key source for funds, are under attack in Congress for financing politically oriented activities. Pending legislation might eliminate such grants completely. But a clearinghouse to provide assistance seems probable. MARC already is sounding out foundations for financial support and should know by yearend whether a clearinghouse can be established.

A Congress of Racial Equality spinoff, the Scholarship, Education Defense Fund for Racial Equality, already assists officials in Fayette, Miss., and other communities. The idea, says MARC's Washington representative, Eleanor Farrar, is "to acquire the expertise to exercise the political power that the democratic process provides." Once they have that, black officeholders hope to push for programs such as better schools and housing, and more employment.

Sniping at Nixon

At the meeting, black officials heard from Nixon spokesmen. But they found little to their liking in Administration programs or proposals. Because they distrust their state governments they distrust the effectiveness of the President's revenue-sharing proposal, even though it calls for automatic distribution of funds to localities by the states. They also feel that Nixon's people have not consulted knowledgeable blacks as often as the past Administration.

Nixon's desegregation stance was roundly attacked for what was called "ambiguity." While the Administration's hard-line posture on law and order was rarely discussed publicly, officials considered it antiblack. They do not consider Attorney General John N. Mitchell a friend in Washington.

The number of black officials has quadrupled in the past four years to about 1,200. A desire to help each other out—with the ultimate goal being greater political power—brought them together. Explains Mrs. Farrar: "It is surprising how interested a Dick Hatcher (mayor of Gary, Ind.) is in what Howard Lee (mayor of Chapel Hill, N. C.) is doing."

High-Ranking Negro Quits SBA, Charging Nixon Hasn't Kept Black Capitalism Vow

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON—The Nixon Administration suffered its first defection by a high-ranking Negro appointee with an emotional resignation announcement by Philip Pruitt, head of the Small Business Administration's minority entrepreneurship program.

Mr. Pruitt, 33 years old, who came to Washington from a Wall Street investment banking firm, blamed his departure chiefly on the President's failure thus far to make good on a campaign pledge for a black capitalism program. "There's been lots of rhetoric in Government about helping blacks but no money has been forthcoming," Mr. Pruitt complained.

Mr. Pruitt disclosed that the Administration has been delaying action on a Treasury proposal that could expand loans for minority businesses to about $370 million in the fiscal year that began July 1. The plan's central feature involves the deposit of $300 million of Treasury funds with banks that would agree to make SBA-guaranteed loans in amounts equal to their share of the deposits. The loans would go to Negroes and other minority-group members starting out or stepping up as independent businessmen.

The plan has been under White House consideration since May, but another SBA source suggested that action has been blocked by a desire not to undermine the President's efforts to cool off the economy.

Mr. Pruitt acknowledged that fiscal problems burden black-capitalism efforts, but he also said, "The President has to reaffirm his commitment to the minorities. The credibility gap is growing wider as far as blacks are concerned."

Campaign Pledge Attached

As a Negro, he said, the greatest strain was the difficulty of working for an Administration widely regarded by Negroes as unfriendly. For example, Whitney Young, executive director of the Urban League, recently termed black capitalism a "shambles" and charged that the Nixon campaign pledge "never has been followed up by any concrete plan or proposals."

Mr. Pruitt has spent much time since taking office on March 21 visiting black communities around the country, and fellow Negroes repeatedly made the same point as Mr. Young when Mr. Pruitt sought to explain SBA objectives, he said.

"I'm frustrated," he declared. "I'm not going to stay here and take all the heat from the black community while the Administration is not committed. It's something I feel as a black man."

Mr. Pruitt cited other factors for his departure, including the behind-the-scenes opposition to his appointment by Sen. Javits of New York, ranking Republican on the Senate Small Business Committee. Mr. Javits felt Mr. Pruitt's former highly paid investment-banking position and his plush East Side apartment in New York had put him out of touch with ghetto problems. The preferred Javits choice would have been a more militant Harlemite—an issue further complicated by Sen. Javits' even stronger opposition to President Nixon's appointment of Hilary Sandoval Jr. as SBA administrator, SBA insiders say.

Another Thorn Cited

Another thorn for both Mr. Pruitt and Mr. Sandoval is the Office of Minority Business Enterprise, which the Nixon Administration set up in the Commerce Department with overall responsibility for the "black capitalism" program. Sources say the SBA has completed plans for its part of the program, but must wait while the newly organized minority business office reappraises problems.

One top SBA official, however, was inclined to blame the Pruitt departure on annoyances growing out of lending restrictions imposed on the agency's existing program due to Vietnam costs and related inflation problems. "If we had some lollipops to give out all of these little problems would be unimportant," he said.

The Government's strong commitment to black capitalism actually dates back to mid-1968, when then-SBA administrator Howard Samuels forged Project Own. The Samuels program envisioned a range of support for minority enterprise but leaned on SBA-guaranteed bank loans projected to total $300 million in the year that began July 1. This bank loan program had worked up to an annual rate of around $90 million, but one SBA source says bankers haven't been inclined to go higher because of tight money.

Backers believe the Treasury proposal currently under study would provide the needed impetus for expansion of guaranteed lending. Another benefit would be to end the need for a separate SBA program of participating in bank loans to minority entrepreneurs. Funds switched from this use then could be applied to riskier loans funded 100% by the agency. This would permit such high-risk lending to reach $70 million in the current fiscal year, up from only about $9 million in the year just ended.

Canadian Consumer Price Index

OTTAWA—The Canadian consumer price index rose 0.8% in June to 125.9% of the 1961 average from 124.9% in May, the Bureau of Statistics said. The latest month's index was 5.2% above its year-ending level.

FOOD STAMPS

WHEREAS, some employers, usually farm employers, refuse to sign forms on which they state the amount they pay employees. In those cases, the employer's refusal to cooperate with the Food Stamp Program denies his employees the opportunity to benefit from the program; and

WHEREAS, the present program is nutritionally unfair to poorer families. If two equally sized families, one having a higher income than the other, joined the program on the same day, the richer family would receive more food stamps for the month than their poorer neighbor; and

WHEREAS, food stamps cannot be used for the purchase of soaps and detergents. After purchasing food stamps a family has little money left to answer its housing, clothing and medical expenses. Most often the family, because it is participating in the program cannot afford to keep its house and family clean; and

WHEREAS, the purchase requirement is too high. Large families that live on $100 or $150 a month cannot afford to pay 30% or more for the purchase of food stamps. Although the family does eat better because of the program the family's standard of housing, clothing and medical care deteriorate. Nor can such a family afford to keep their children in school while participating in such an expensive program; and

WHEREAS, the attitude of Food Stamp personnel on the county level often times discourages participating. Clients have no access to information or regulations and, therefore, feel at the mercy of the whim of individual workers.

NOW THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED that the Seventh Constitutional Convention of the Arkansas State AFL-CIO urge that:

1. The state should make it an offense for an employer to withhold wage statements from the Food Stamp office.

2. The State Food Stamp Guidelines should be amended to pay out an equal quantity of stamps to equal sized families no matter what purchase requirement the family can afford.

3. The State Offices should petition the Agriculture Department and members of Congress to take action so as to amend the program to include the purchase of soaps and detergents. If no action is forthcoming the State should, of its own initiation, distribute cleaning products to Food Stamp clients.

4. The state should budget funds so as to lower purchase requirements, especially the purchase requirements of large families.

5. Special training sessions should be held by state authorities for the sole purpose of impressing upon county personnel the goals and the importance of the program to the state and the peoples residing therein. Food Stamp regulations should be made available in simplified form so that the client would be aware of his rights under current legislation.

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that copies of this resolution be sent to the Governor, the State Welfare Department, and our Congressional delegation.

UNION LABEL

WHEREAS, organized labor must continue to strengthen itself not only on the collective bargaining, political, and legislative fronts, but also as the largest single block of consumers of the nation's goods and services. This must be done to counteract the continuous assaults of anti-union forces; and

WHEREAS, one of the most powerful weapons available to labor in its struggle for industrial democracy is the Union Label. It is a trademark of unionism, signifying that the goods and services were made or rendered in unionized factories, stores, barber shops, and other establishments, under decent working conditions and equitable wages; and

WHEREAS, thus it is time for a rededication to the principle that organized labor takes care of its own by demanding the appropriate Union Label, Shop Card, or Service Button on all goods and services purchased by a union member of his family. Adherence to this principle could effectively destroy business opposition to union organizing efforts. Exploitation of employees in low-wage sweat shops and runaway plants looking for cheap labor could be curtailed.

NOW THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED that this Seventh Constitutional Convention of the Arkansas State AFL-CIO reaffirms its support of the AFL-CIO Union Label and Service Trades Department's program of Label promotion and urges all union members and their families to patronize, where possible, only unionized shops, stores, and services, and to demand the Union Label on all manufactured products.

FOOTWEAR IMPORTS INTO THE UNITED STATES

WHEREAS, foreign made shoes continue to enter the United States at an alarming rate and increasingly jeopardize the American shoe industry and the jobs it provides; and

WHEREAS, imports of leather and vinyl footwear -- exclusive of rubber footwear -- have increased from less than 10 million pairs in 1956 to 176 million pairs in 1968 -- amounting to 27% of domestic production and 22% of domestic consumption; and

WHEREAS, U. S. exports of such footwear declined from 5 million pairs in 1956 to less than 3 million pairs in 1968 due to extremely high tariffs and other discriminating obstacles which foreign nations impose against U. S. made footwear; and

WHEREAS, the imbalance of trade in footwear between the United States and other national is due to the vast difference in labor costs such as the following: JAPAN: Imports up from 1954-56 base of 2 1/2 million pairs to 65 1/4 million pairs in 1968 with prevailing hourly wage, including fringe benefits, of 57.2¢; ITALY: Imports up from 1954-56 base of 1 million pairs to 59 million pairs in 1968 with prevailing hourly wage, including fringe benefits, of $1.04; SPAIN: Imports up from 1954-56 base of 23,000 pairs to 14 1/4 million pairs in 1968 with prevailing hourly wage, including fringe benefits, of 55¢; TAIWAN: Imports up from zero in 1954-56 to 15 1/4 million pairs in 1968 with prevailing hourly wage, including fringe benefits, of 14.4¢ for men and 7.9¢ for women; UNITED STATES: Prevailing hourly wage, including fringe benefits, is $2.70; and

WHEREAS, in 1968 an additional 56,000 American shoe workers should have been employed to produce the foreign made footwear sold in the United States; and

WHEREAS, estimates by qualified sources indicate that if imports of foreign footwear are allowed to increase at present rates the shoe industry in the United States and the 235,000 jobs it now provides may well disappear from the American scene within the next ten years; and

WHEREAS, American shoe workers reject any assumption that the shoe or any other American industry should be allowed to expire rather than risk a boycott of American produced goods by foreign countries. We believe such countries buy from the United States only because they need the goods we produce at the price and quality we produce them for and will not deviate from this sound economic practice simply because America takes reasonable and necessary steps to protect its industries and the jobs of its workers.

NOW THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED:

1. That this Seventh Constitutional Convention of the Arkansas State AFL-CIO urges National AFL-CIO to do everything possible to prevent further reductions of tariffs on shoes entering this country.

2. That the National AFL-CIO will work for more effective and strict enforcement of anti-dumping laws to prevent the disposal of goods onto U. S. markets by foreign countries who easily circumvent present anti-dumping laws.

3. That this convention urges the National AFL-CIO to pledge its support for passage of quota laws or other forms of "Orderly Marketing" legislation which would allow foreign countries a fair share of American markets but prevent them from taking complete possession of our markets simply because American workers and manufacturers cannot compete with imported goods produced at wages so low they would be unlawful in the United States.

HEALTH AND SAFETY REGULATIONS

WHEREAS, it is empirically clear that garment workers labor in an environment where they constantly inhale dust and dye; and

WHEREAS, it is medically established that the constant inhalation of dust and dye in garment shop causes bronchitis and emphysema; and

WHEREAS, technology has advanced to the plateau where dust and dye clearning machines and devices can easily be integrated into the garment shop and made a part of the operating machinery of this shop; and

WHEREAS, it is the duty of the Commissioner of Labor of the state of Arkansas to promulgate health and safety regulations governing the working conditions of employees in the state of Arkansas.

NOW THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED that the Arkansas State AFL-CIO go on record as demanding that the Commissioner of Labor for the state of Arkansas promulgate health regulations which will require garment shops to install machinery and other devices that will eradicate the dust and dye environment which will result in the extermination of bronchitis and emphysema caused to garment workers by inhaling those crippling agents.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST WOMEN

WHEREAS, it is the law of the United States and the state of Arkansas that there should be no discrimination against women regarding wages and other terms and conditions of employment; and

WHEREAS, women can substantially perform work that is comparable to work performed by men; and

WHEREAS, employers discriminate against women regarding wages and other terms and conditions of employment under such pretexts as job content for males is different; men perform "heavy-duty" work; and training programs for the higher paying jobs limited only to men.

CHIROPRACTIC SERVICES
UNDER MEDICARE

WHEREAS, organized labor has consistently been the principal supporter of the Medicare program for senior citizens; and

WHEREAS, the members of AFL-CIO unions are among the principal beneficiaries of Medicare; and

WHEREAS, chiropractic services, as authorized by Arkansas law and this state's Workmen's Compensation program, have proved to be highly beneficial to workers and their families in this state; and

WHEREAS, Title 18 of the Social Security Act fails to provide such beneficial services in Medicare.

NOW THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED by the Seventh Constitutional Convention of the Arkansas State AFL-CIO that we believe that Title 18 of the Social Security Act should be amended to provide for chiropractic services under Medicare.

AMERICA'S FORGOTTEN PEOPLE

WHEREAS, thirty years of welfare legislation in the fifty member states has created a thicket of interlocking and overlapping laws and regulations which has frustrated the intent and purposes of the whole concept and has only succeeded in further debasing a whole segment of our society to the point where the children of many welfare recipient families are taught from the cradle, by example of their parents, the means by which they can qualify, in their own turn, to become welfare cases; and

WHEREAS, a continuation of the process of degeneration of generation after generation of welfare families and the consequent weakening and destruction of family ties, in order to qualify for welfare benefits, is creating a whole host of problems for our cities, our courts and indeed the whole fabric of our social system and is, in fact, a national disgrace.

THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED that the Arkansas State AFL-CIO go on record as urging the National AFL-CIO to explore one of the several plans, such as "Negative Income Tax", "Employer of Last Resort", and others and to adopt as a legislative goal that plan which will offer the best opportunities for a very substantial portion of fellow Americans to be "delivered from the dole" and become a constructive part of our great American industrial society.

ARKANSAS STATE AFL-CIO VOTING RECORD

How Members of the 66th General Assembly Voted on Vital Issues

JANUARY 9 to MARCH 31, 1967
SPECIAL SESSION, FEBRUARY 15 to FEBRUARY 21, 1968*

The 66th General Assembly considered many bills of interest to the working people of Arkansas. The actions of our legislators affect the welfare of all of our citizens and are best revealed by how they voted on crucial bills. Votes on motions and amendments are also recorded because it is just as important, sometimes more so, than the vote on final passage. The Arkansas State AFL-CIO has compiled the voting record of Arkansas legislators on 23 issues that labor was vitally interested in. Below are summaries of the bills:

1. HOUSE BILL 44 — DISHONGH — PREVAILING WAGE. This bill provided for the payment of prevailing wages on state, county and municipal construction. Such a law would guarantee that our tax money would not be used by unfair contractors to employ substandard labor at substandard wages. It would assure decent wages, better workmanship, and fair competitive bidding on building and construction projects. An amendment by Nicholson would have crippled the bill. It provided that only towns with 100,000 population would be covered. Opposed by the AFL-CIO, the amendment was defeated.

2. HOUSE BILL 44 — DISHONGH — PREVAILING WAGE. Another amendment, by J. Smith, would have helped kill the bill. It provided that the minimum cost of jobs to which the prevailing wage would apply was $425,000 rather than $25,000 as called for in the bill. Opposed by the AFL-CIO, the amendment was defeated.

3. HOUSE BILL 44 — DISHONGH — PREVAILING WAGE. This is the vote on final passage in the House. Supported by AFL-CIO, it passed by a vote of 64 to 22 but was withdrawn in the Senate after several crippling amendments were adopted by voice vote.

4. HOUSE BILL 116 — BRANDON — GARNISHMENT. This bill provided that the first $25 per week of net wages of all laborers and mechanics shall be "absolutely exempt" from garnishment. Supported by the AFL-CIO, this bill passed both Houses and became Act 65.

5. HOUSE BILL 120 — C. LEDBETTER — ELECTION HOURS. This bill provided that the hours the polls will be open for elections will be extended an hour in the evening, thus permitting the polls to be open from 8:00 a. m. to 7:30 p. m. Supported by the AFL-CIO, the bill passed both Houses and became Act 139.

6. HOUSE BILL 211 — HAMILTON — DUES CHECKOFF. This bill permits payroll deductions for labor unions in state institutions, after proper authorization by employees. Supported by the AFL-CIO, this measure passed both Houses and became Act 133.

7. HOUSE BILL 236 — DURRETT — TAX RELIEF. This bill would have given tax relief where needed most — among the lower and middle income taxpayers. It would have increased the state income tax credit allowance as follows: single individuals, $25 ($17.50 now); head of family or married individual living with husband or wife, $50 ($35 now); each dependent's exemption would be increased from $6 to $9. Supported by the AFL-CIO this bill passed both Houses but was vetoed by the Governor on the grounds that the revenue loss would be too great.

8. HOUSE BILL 252 — WINDSOR — UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE. After passage in the House this bill came up for a vote in the Senate. Opposed by the AFL-CIO, the bill was defeated by a vote of 14 to 14, with 18 votes needed for passage. However, Senator Alagood moved for reconsideration.

9. HOUSE BILL 252 — WINDSOR — UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE. Tremendous pressure was exerted by our opponents, and upon reconsideration this measure, opposed by the AFL-CIO, passed by a margin of one vote.

10. HOUSE BILL 252 — WINDSOR — UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE. After defeat in Committee of the same drastic bill, aimed at many categories of unemployment, that was vetoed by the Governor in 1965, this measure was introduced. It disqualified, for the duration of their unemployment, workers who voluntarily quit. This bill unfairly penalizes workers with different skills and does not take into account periods of heavy unemployment when workers will have a hard time finding any job. Providing that voluntary quits must have thirty days of paid work to be eligible, unscrupulous employers will force workers to quit rather than lay them off or discharge them. Opposed by the AFL-CIO, this bill passed both Houses and became Act 248 without the Governor's signature.

11. HOUSE BILL 604—C. LEDBETTER—HUMAN RESOURCES. This bill declared it to be the public policy of the state that the vital resources of this state include the full utilization of all its citizens without regard to race, color, religion, sex, age, national origin or economic condition. The measure called for a commission to be appointed by the Governor, to investigate, study and report on the policies of the agencies of government. Supported by the AFL-CIO, it passed the House and was tabled by the Senate.

12. SENATE BILL 13 — DOUGLAS — FREE TEXTBOOKS. This bill provided that the state would furnish textbooks for public school pupils in grades 9 - 12. But it is not to be effective until the average salary of teachers reaches 80% of the average salary in the United States. Supported by the AFL-CIO, this bill passed both Houses and became Act 334.

13. SENATE BILL 61 — LOOKADOO — PARTY AFFILIATION. This bill amends our Voter Registration law to require voters to register by party affiliation if they want to vote in either the Democratic or Republican primaries. We believe it is unfair for voters to cross over and vote in the other party's primary. In the General Election no matter what your party affiliation you can vote for any candidate, whether Democrat, Republican or Independent. Supported by the AFL-CIO, this bill passed both Houses and was vetoed by the Governor. The veto was overridden by the General Assembly and became Act 457. The vote recorded here is on overriding the Governor's veto. This Act, by petition, has been referred to a vote of the people in the November General Election and is not now in effect.

14. SENATE BILL 146 — FIRE FIGHTERS HOURS — FLETCHER AND MOORE. This bill reduced the hours of work for Fire Fighters from 72 to 56. Needing 18 votes, the bill was defeated by one vote. The record of this vote was expunged and, therefore, cannot be printed. A key vote was taken on an amendment by Ingram that reduced salaries and would have made the bill unacceptable. Opposed by the AFL-CIO, the amendment failed.

15. SENATE BILL 455 — FIRE FIGHTERS HOURS — MOORE. This bill reduced the hours of work for Fire Fighters from 72 to 64. Supported by the AFL-CIO, it passed the Senate but died on the calendar in the House.

16. SENATE BILL 455 — FIRE FIGHTERS HOURS — MOORE. This bill reduced the hours of work for Fire Fighters from 72 to 64. Because of the rules in effect it could not be brought up for a vote unless a motion to suspend the rules received a two-thirds vote. The vote recorded here is on a motion by Goodwin to suspend the rules and bring Senate Bill 455 up for a vote on final passage. Supported by the AFL-CIO, the motion failed, thus permitting the bill to die on the calendar.

17. SENATE BILL 366 — HOWELL — CITY SALES TAX. This measure authorizes a sales tax for counties and cities, subject to approval by the voters. Opposed by the AFL-CIO, it passed the Senate but died on the calendar in the House.

18. SENATE BILL 366 — HOWELL — CITY SALES TAX. The key vote in the House on the city sales tax measure was on an amendment by Brandon that would have made the bill unacceptable by providing that the tax would not go into effect until every city in the county approved it. Supported by the AFL-CIO, the amendment passed. The bill died on the calendar.

19. SENATE BILL 303 — HOWELL AND B. ALLEN — MINIMUM WAGE. This bill establishes a State Minimum Wage law of $1 per hour the first year, $1.10 the second year, and $1.20 an hour the third year. The key vote on this bill was a motion to suspend the rules and bring the bill up for a vote on final passage. Supported by the AFL-CIO, the motion needed 24 votes, but only received 18. Therefore, the bill died on the calendar.

*20. SENATE BILL 61 — HOWELL, SPRICK, ALAGOOD, B. ALLEN, MOORE — MINIMUM WAGE. An amendment by Day would have excluded from coverage many part time and seasonal workers. Opposed by the AFL-CIO, the amendment was defeated.

*21. SENATE BILL 61 — HOWELL, SPRICK, ALAGOOD, B. ALLEN, MOORE — MINIMUM WAGE. An amendment by Foster would have broadened the definition of excluded agricultural labor. Opposed by the AFL-CIO as being unnecessary, the amendment was defeated.

*22. SENATE BILL 61 — HOWELL, SPRICK, ALAGOOD, B. ALLEN, MOORE — MINIMUM WAGE. Put into the Special Session Call by Governor Rockefeller, this bill called for a State Minimum Wage of $1 an hour, increasing after one year to $1.10 per hour, and increasing after two years to $1.20 an hour. It covered all establishments with five or more workers, with certain exemptions. Supported by the AFL-CIO, it passed both Houses and became Act 25. This Act replaces the 1915 Minimum Wage law for females that provided for $1.25 a day for experienced women and is the first general Minimum Wage law in Arkansas history.

*23. SENATE BILL 62 — GRIFFIN — MINIMUM WAGE. This bill called for a State Minimum Wage of $1 an hour, increasing after one year to $1.10 per hour, and increasing after two years to $1.20 an hour. It covered all establishments with six or more workers, with certain exemptions. Although preferring SB 61, the AFL-CIO supported this measure. It passed both Houses but was vetoed by the Governor when he signed SB 61.

KEY TO VOTING

R—Right
W—Wrong

A—Absent With Favorable Effect

A—Absent With Unfavorable Effect

S—Sick

Because many times a legislator will be absent when a vote is taken, we have broken down the absentees; and by inserting a different colored key, attempted to show that in many cases an absent or not voting situation is actually favorable to our viewpoint on a particular bill. Only if the A is in Red is it to be considered an unfavorable vote by your Senator or Representative.

Dear Bill:

I received your announcement of the Arkansas Institute. It looks to be in good shape and I trust we will have a good turnout. Will you and the other officers be able to follow-up with the more personal touch?

The program is all lined up except for the participation by local Negro leaders and their names should be in my hands next week.

Please be in touch with me if any questions arise.

Sincerely,

Emory F. Via, Director

Supplement to CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT DATA BOOK
REDISTRICTED STATES

June 1966 CDDB Supp. No. 12

ARKANSAS

Districts of the 90th Congress

This report presents selected population, housing, and vote cast data for Arkansas, districts of the 90th Congress. Redistricting legislation was enacted in Arkansas in June 1965. Corresponding data for Arkansas applying to the districts of both the 88th and 89th Congresses were presented in the Congressional District Data Book (Districts of the 88th Congress)[1] issued by the Bureau of the Census in February 1964.

The content of this Supplement differs from that of the basic volume in the following respects:

1. The map presents district boundaries which will be in effect for the 90th Congress;

2. Data from the 1960 Censuses of Population and Housing (Items 29-254 and 399-511) have been retabulated to accord with the newly-defined district boundaries;

3. Data for vote cast in 1964 for President and for Representative have been added; 1952 data for vote cast have been omitted;

4. Other data shown in the original volume (Items 255-398) have been omitted. It was not feasible to retabulate those data which came primarily from the 1958 Censuses of Business, Manufactures, and Mineral Industries, the 1959 Census of Agriculture, and the 1962 Census of Governments.

Supplements to the Congressional District Data Book were issued in January 1965 for the following seven States that redistricted for the 89th Congress: Alabama, Colorado, Connecticut, Georgia, Michigan, South Carolina, and Wisconsin.[2]

The source notes and explanations for the vote cast, population, and housing items in the Congressional District Data Book apply also to this report except as follows: The source for vote cast for President, 1964, is Governmental Affairs Institute, America at the Polls, University of Pittsburgh Press, 1965 (copyright); the source for vote cast for Representatives, 1964, is Congressional Quarterly, Inc., Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report #13, "Complete Returns of the 1964 Elections by Congressional District," Part 1, March 26, 1965 (copyright).

VOTER REGISTRATION IN THE SOUTH

SUMMER, 1966

VOTER EDUCATION PROJECT
SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL, INC.
5 Forsyth St., N.W.
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

The figures presented herein were accumulated during the summer and late summer of 1966. While they do not represent the final registration figures for the November elections, the difference is not expected to be large. The figures were compiled from a variety of sources---public and private, official and unofficial.

For four states---Arkansas, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia---complete or near-complete county-by-county figures showing white and Negro registration were not available. For these four states, statewide estimates have been made, based on the best information obtainable.

For two states---Florida and Mississippi---figures did not indicate the race of a sizeable number of registrants. These have been divided between the white and Negro columns on the basis of VEP estimates.

Statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council on

Consumer Legislation

February 24, 1967
Bal Harbour, Florida

High on the list of items which demand immediate and extensive attention from the 90th Congress are the problems of the American consumer.

Of primary concern to consumers are the specific products bought for personal use. Consumers need and should have adequate protection against fraudulent practices, assurance that the products are safe to use, and that product and price information is adequate and accurate.

In testing the current state of affairs by these standards, we find that much Congressional concern and action is needed. Specifically we will seek:

1. Action to remedy the exploitation of consumers by those who provide consumer credit.

Consumers are indebted for loans and installment sales purchases in an amount totaling $95 billion. They are paying finance and interest charges at the rate of $13 billion a year on this debt. A first step toward consumer self-protection in this area is the enactment of the long-standing "Truth-in-Lending" Bill to require all credit vendors to tell the borrower what the dollar cost of the finance charges will be on his credit and to state these charges in terms of a true annual interest rate.

Legislation is also needed to end misleading price advertising of articles sold on credit, where the reader is told only the monthly payment required and not the total actual cost of the article if bought on time.

High pressure door-to-door salesmen frequently sign up buyers on the spot for products they may not really want and for costly credit obligations they cannot carry. Legislation should be enacted to give buyers a legal "breathing spell" to change their minds.

The tangled field of consumer credit is not limited to these abuses. We urge the Congress to undertake or authorize a comprehensive study of consumer credit laws and practices.

2. A general investigation by the Congress of the insurance industry in all its aspects.

There is mounting evidence of excessive charges for credit life insurance in consumer credit contracts, fraud in the sale of mail-order insurance, and automobile insurance that is overpriced, often capriciously cancelled, and of consumer losses from liquidations of "high risk" insurers. Congress should devise and enact legislative remedies for these conditions and bring the entire industry under federal regulation.

-more-

3. Action on the over-pricing of key consumer products.

We ask for a re-opening of general investigations into the pricing of prescription drugs with a view to framing new legislation to curb excessive costs to the buying public and to government purchasing agencies. Special legislation is needed to prevent overcharging and overprescribing by physicians with a direct financial stake in the products they prescribe.

In the past year the rising price of food has caused widespread public concern. We ask that the food price situation be thoroughly reviewed, with special emphasis on the built-in, cost-plus effect of excesses in advertising games, trading stamps and other promotional gimmicks. Congress should maintain a continuing review of the facts on the market structure and competitive situation in the food industry.

4. Legislation to provide consumers with unbiased product information to aid in the wise purchase of consumer products and to end misleading, false or fraudulent information about consumer products including the sale of land.

Appropriate support should be given both to strengthening the authority and to increasing the appropriations of the Federal Trade Commission as the public's principal agent against frauds, swindles and misleading advertising in interstate commerce.

The Department of Agriculture, which now administers a voluntary food grading system, should be authorized to establish a compulsory consumer grading system for basic food products. Such a system would aid in the economical and satisfying procurement of these necessities of life based on knowledge rather than promotional claims.

We are convinced of the value of consumer education to supply impartial information about consumer products and product characteristics for the myriad of items competing for the consumer's pocketbook. We support increased government effort to make information available and we will continue the AFL-CIO's own efforts in this area that are conducted by our Community Services Department.

5. Swift action to insure the safety of consumer products and to prevent accidental death and injury to those who buy them.

The Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act should be tightened to insure that all drugs sold for human use actually meet prescribed standards of safety, quality and efficacy, that cosmetics are tested for safety before sale to the public, and that medical equipment and devices are safe and effective before being prescribed by doctors.

-more-

Accidents from consumer misuse of drugs, cosmetics and pressurized food containers can be reduced by requiring clear and adequate warning labels. Indiscriminate distribution of "drug samples" should be brought under control as a further safety measure.

In the food field, consumer safety requires inspection for wholesomeness and cleanliness of all meat and poultry, whether or not the meat crosses interstate lines.

The Flammable Fabrics Act needs updating to reach beyond its limited coverage of flammable clothing.

A National Commission on Product Safety, as proposed in a bill sponsored by Senator Warren Magnuson, should be established to study the need for compulsory safety standards in the design of other household equipment and appliances.

6. Establishment of formal governmental machinery to help assure that consumer problems will receive the attention they deserve and that solutions will not only be devised but aggressively promoted both by the Congress and the Executive Branch.

We welcome the formation of consumer subcommittees as parts of existing standing committees of the Congress. In the Executive Branch, we endorse the long-standing proposal for the creation of either a Department of Consumer Affairs or a statutory Office of Consumer Affairs.

President Johnson has focused the attention of the Congress and the nation on the problems of the consumer in his far-reaching message to the Congress last week.

The AFL-CIO, which is probably the largest organized group of consumers in the nation, is delighted that the President has singled ~~signaled~~ out the problems of the consumer for concerted action.

The Administration intends to make this a major legislative undertaking and so do we. The 90th Congress can -- and should -- become the consumer-conscience Congress and we are going to do our part to make sure that it does.

WHEN YOU BUY A USED CAR

Do you gamble

when you buy a used car?

You'll probably lose!

The first thing to decide is ... what kind of car you need: low cost? big car? long trips? just to drive to work?

Decide before you look what you want to buy -- (year, body style, etc.) Find out if that year and model was a "good buy" when it was new. Has the repair record been good for that year and model? If not -- watch out: they never get better than they were.

Don't let a salesman talk you into the kind he wants you to buy. When you find a car you think you like...

Get a good mechanic you trust to look at it with you. It's worth paying a small fee for this.

If repairs are needed, get them done before you buy the car.

One of a series of leaflets

on better buying and credit

If you can't do this,
look for these things yourself:

1. Ripples, bumps, grainy surfaces, or mismatching paint, along the body of the car. If there's a lot of this, the car probably was in a serious accident.

2. Doors, windows, trunk lids that don't open and close easily, or have too much space between the edges. If they stick, maybe the car's frame was damaged in an accident.

3. Uneven tire wear. More than two inches free play in the wheel. A clunking noise when you shake the front wheels firmly. If you find any of these, the front end needs repairs.

4. Sinking brake pedal. Brakes that grab or make the car swerve. Any of these mean the brakes need repairs. Any good service station can check the brake linings for you.

5. Any clunking noise in the transmission or motor. This could mean serious trouble.

6. Blue exhaust smoke or a film of oil inside the mouth of the exhaust pipe. These are signs that the motor needs new rings, an expensive job.

7. Accessories that don't work: radio, heater, wipers.

When you find a car that passes these tests ...

Be sure the dealer can pass his test, too.

Here's the " dealer's test " :

1. Will he let you drive the car?

2. Does he make you wait around all day so you're ready to sign anything to get off the lot?

3. Does he offer "no down payment" deals? Does he try to prove you're paying less instead of more?

4. Does he want you to sign a contract with blank spaces? ... WATCH OUT!

5. Does he shift you from one salesman -- to another -- to another?

6. Does he try not to give you a copy of the contract?

7. Does he try not to tell you exactly what the total cost of the car is in dollars?

= $1300 cash or
$1700 financed

8. Does he try to sell you insurance himself?

If the answer to any of these questions is YES:

BE C A R E F U L !

Once you sign, it's too late to change your mind.

You may bring home -

A CLUNK !

BE SMART!

DO
demand a copy of the contract.

DO
shop around for your loan.

DO
buy your auto insurance through an agent or broker.

- - - - - -

DON'T gamble!

DON'T
discuss what you can afford to pay for a car at the dealer's. (Work it out at home; the dealer's office may be bugged!)

DON'T believe the mileage shown on the dial. (It's probably been turned back!) Sometimes rugs, foot pedal pads, upholstery tell you more.

DON'T sign any contract that has blank spaces.

SAVE

AND:

Protect your Health

"Beauty" is big business!
New products appear every day. And advertising tries to make all of them wonderful, glowing, romantic. You wonder how you can get along without them!

What do you know about cosmetics?

How can you tell which to use?

Will they be safe?

The Food and Drug Administration enforces a law on safety of cosmetics. Many consumer injuries led Congress to pass this law. But you can't depend on FDA to do it all. You need to know too!

REMEMBER -
Cosmetics are used on the skin and hair -- and these are sensitive. Infection easily occurs if they are mistreated.

1. Don't believe extravagant or impossible claims.

2. Always read the label.

3. Note warnings, follow instructions carefully.

KNOW THE LAW

The law says the label must tell the truth. It may not claim the impossible. BUT: new ideas come up all the time -- and it takes the LAW a while to catch up. SO: BE ON YOUR GUARD!

Anything known to cause an allergic reaction must be shown on the label. BUT: you may be allergic to most anything. And all ingredients don't have to be listed (except for drugs). Give yourself a preliminary patch or skin test to be sure.

Hair dye labels must show the way to use them safely. They must warn against use on eyebrows and eyelashes.

Colors used in cosmetics must be proved safe.

All cosmetics that are also drugs must list ingredients on the label.

The label must tell you the net weight, the name and address of the manufacturer or distributor.

FDA may remove from sale any cosmetic that is harmful or falsely labelled. FDA may sue the distributor in federal court.

BE CAREFUL - when you use skin bleaches, hormone creams, deodorants, hair dyes, wave preparations.

1. Most skin bleaches use ammoniated mercury. Many are allergic to this. Always make a preliminary skin test. Never leave skin bleaches on more than a half hour. Never use them over a large area. Children under 12 should never use them.

2. Royal jellys and hormone creams can't cure the wrinkles of age. Claims for these products have been proved false. Hormone creams are dangerous -- you may absorb estrogen through the skin.

3. There are two kinds of deodorants. One only stops bacterial action on perspiration. The other kind, anti-perspirant, is a "drug." The aluminum compounds used in these reduce secretion from the sweat glands. Too long use may irritate and injure the sweat glands.

4. There are several hair dyes on the market. Some color hair directly and can be washed out by a few shampoos. They are called tints or rinses.
   A more permanent dye works by oxidation - mixing with peroxide. Always make a skin patch test before you use it.
   A third kind of dye contains metallic salts (often lead or sulfur: these are poison if swallowed). The effect comes from repetition. Do not use this type of dye if the scalp is cut or bruised.

5. Most wave preparations and hair sprays on the market have been proved safe.
   But keep these away from your nose and mouth.

ALWAYS -

Think before you buy; NO cosmetic will grow hair on a bald head, remove wrinkles, or restore lost youth to the skin.

IMPORTANT -

If you believe you've been gypped or injured by a cosmetic, report the facts to the nearest FDA office or to your local or state regulatory agency.

Seek medical help if needed.

Save the rest of the product or the container.

Report it to the packer or distributor.

See your doctor if you've a skin infection. Don't rely on a cosmetic.

WHEN YOU BUY

FABRICS

When you sew, you can save lots of money ... if you buy the right fabric. To choose the right one, you need to know these things:

- What the fabric is made of.
- How it will wear, how to care for it.
- If it is suitable for your use.

1. What is it made of?

Natural fibers: cotton, wool, silk & linen.

COTTON: Inexpensive, cool, comfortable, practical. Easy to sew, easy to wash and iron. Good for variety of uses. Many colors, designs, weaves.

WOOL: Wears well, warm and comfortable. Easy to sew. Ideal for coats, suits, dresses. May be washable, with care, if so labeled. Use cool water, steam iron with pressing cloth.

SILK: Often expensive; many different textures, some smooth, some "nubby." If properly cared for, lasts for years. Pure silk may wash well, with care: mild soap and cool water. Never use a hot iron or chlorine bleach. Damaged by perspiration; stains easily.

LINEN: Many weights, from sheer to heavy. Often very expensive. Rayon "linen" is usually treated to be wrinkle-proof, looks like real linen; make sure you know. Real linen wears longer. If not specially treated, wrinkles easily, may be hard to iron.

Man-made fibers (synthetics): these are some of the most common:

NYLON: Durable, lightweight, washes and dries easily, does not shrink. Use most soaps and detergents, oxygen type bleach, not chlorine bleach. Not weakened by perspiration. Blended with other fibers adds strength.

RAYON & ACETATE: (Some tradenames: Ecele, Celanese, Estron.) Weaker than nylon. Can look like cotton, wool, silk, satin, linen, fur. Color-fast. Resists wrinkles. Good for women's garments.

POLYESTER FIBERS: (some brandnames: Dacron, Fortrel, Kodel) - Blend well with cotton, rayon, wool. Wash and wear, little or no ironing, colorfast. Hold permanent pleats, resist wrinkles. Good for women's and children's clothes.

ACRYLIC FIBERS: (Some brandnames: Orlon, Creslan, Acrilan) - Bulky but lightweight. Washable, colorfast, hold creases. Not as strong as nylon. Blend well with other fibers. Good for clothing and curtains.

GLASS FIBERS: (One brandname: Fiberglas) - Very strong, washable, colorfast, quick drying. Sunlight doesn't hurt it. Excellent for curtains. Don't wash in machine - glass fibers spin off , cling to family clothes, cause skin irritation.

SPANDEX: Some tradenames: Lycra, Vyrene) Stretch fabric used in bathing suits, girdles, other garments where stretch is needed. Washes well, dries quickly, use oxygen bleach, not chlorine type.

Other brand names of man-made fibers are: Arnel, Vyeron, Zefram, Zefkrome, Dynel, Verel, Spandelle, Glospan, Fortisan, Celaperm.

Many fabrics are blends of two or more fibers. This may give them the best features of each fiber.

2. How will the fabric wear? How must you care for it?

Get the facts before you buy - don't gamble! READ THE LABEL (on the end of the bolt). It should tell you:

- what it's made of . natural or synthetic fibers, or a blend.

- if it has special finishes to make it look better, wear longer, be easy to care for. Is it wrinkle resistant? Squeeze a corner in your hand. Do the wrinkles go away? If so, it won't need much ironing. It may be treated to be water-repellant, or moth-proof.

- if it is washable
  whether bleach should be used; if it's preshrunk. ("Sanforized" cotton shrinks only 1%; "preshrunk" cotton may shrink 3%. Don't buy woven fabric that will shrink more than 2.5%. Don't buy knitted fabrics that will shrink more than 3.5%.)

- if it's colorfast
  if it will keep its color through washing and exposure to sun. Colors last best when dyed before weaving. When torn ends of solid color look white or light, fabric was dyed after weaving. Vat dyes, properly applied, last best.

If the label doesn't tell you, ask the salesperson or the buyer.

Check knitted material closely. If the knit loops are round, the knit will keep its shape better than if they are long and tight.

3. Is it suitable for your use?

- Does it suit the pattern you'll use? Buy the pattern first so you'll know how much you'll need. Be sure to get enough material. The pattern gives hints about fabrics you should use.

- Does the color and design suit the personality, age, and figure type of the wearer?

- Is it easy for you to sew? If you have not done much sewing, plaids, stripes, and one-way prints are difficult; all-over designs or solid colors will be easier, and probably look better.

For curtains and upholstery, choose strong fabrics the sun won't hurt. Some good curtain materials are cottons, fiberglas, nylon (if treated for sunlight), orlon and dacron. For upholstery, get a durable, heavy, closely woven fabric. A Scotchgard finish is a good idea; it resists oil and dust stains.

WHEN YOU BUY FURNITURE

Furniture is expensive. And remember: if you make a mistake . . . you have to live with it!

First . . .

DECIDE WHAT YOU WANT

Before you start to look, talk things over at home. What color do you want? What style? Will it "go with" what you have now? Will it fit into the room? How much do you plan to pay?

Once you know what you want

SHOP AROUND

You can buy new, used, or unfinished furniture. Which do you want?

You can find real bargains at non-profit "thrift" stores. Second-hand stores can be a smart choice too, if you're very careful. Be sure though . . . you usually can't return second-hand purchases.

You can buy well-made unfinished furniture -- and there are many easy-to-use paints and stains.

One of a series of leaflets

on better buying and credit

TEST YOUR DEALER

Compare at least two stores. Then, when you see something you like, be sure you know about the company that makes it . . . and the dealer who sells it. Is the company well-known? Does it give a guarantee? Has the dealer been in business long? If the answer to any of these questions is "no,"
BE CAREFUL.

Does the dealer display furniture without price tags -- or with "phoney" prices? Does he advertise a good buy to get you into his store (this is called "bait") -- then try to sell you something else?

Does he rush you? Does he offer you "free" gifts? Does he confuse you about the total price you'll pay? If the answer to any of these questions is "yes," WALK OUT!

Now you've found a dealer you can trust . . .

LOOK CAREFULLY AT THE FURNITURE

Frame: Are the joints strong and reinforced? Lean on it. Does it wobble? If it's made of metal, be sure there are no jagged edges.

Fabric: All fabrics wear well if they're made well. Look closely at how the fabric is woven: the tighter the weave, the longer it will last.

Fiber: Some fibers are waterproof; some aren't. Ask your dealer about each kind, and READ THE LABELS.

THINGS TO LOOK FOR

Upholstered furniture: Is it comfortable? Can you sit on it without hitting the frame? Can you push against the back without hitting the frame?

Are seams and patterns even and matched? Are hems and pleats straight? Are there loose threads? Does the underside sag?

Wood furniture: Do drawers glide smoothly? Are they made with interlocking joints so they're strong and rigid? Are joints well-glued -- or just nailed?

Do doors swing freely without rubbing? Are all knobs on tight? Are there any splits in the wood? Any scratches?

S O . . .

Before you buy,

BE SURE YOU'RE READY

Have you compared prices? Have you READ ALL THE LABELS? Have you studied all guarantees? Are there any blanks in your sales contract?
(DON'T SIGN!)

Do you know the true annual interest rate? (Be sure you check this out -- it can be a shocker!)

Do you understand all terms including total price? If you can answer "yes" to all these questions you're ready. GOOD LUCK!

A SAFER CAR CAN

SAVE YOUR LIFE

What do you look for in a car? Color, style, size, speed and comfort? But how safe is that car? Of course you need to be a careful driver. But was your car built to save your life?

Does your car have the built-in safety the Federal Government demands in its new cars? Does your 1966 compact or medium-size car have:

1. Front and rear safety belts
2. Padded dashboard and padded sun visors
3. Two-speed windshield wipers and washer
4. Back-up lights
5. Outside rear-view mirror.

Some 1966 cars have even more safety features. Ask your dealer for them. Some older cars are safer than others -- check this list.

1967 cars should be even safer to drive. Besides the things already listed, look for -

6. Recessed or set-in instrument panel and accessories
7. Steering wheel and column that absorb a crash
8. Safety door latches and hinges that won't snap off
9. Firmly-anchored seat frames
10. Safety glass in windshield, windows

11. Four-way flasher to signal when the car's stalled

12. Dual braking system (if one fails, the other takes over)

13. Standard bumper heights on all cars

14. Standard gear-shift positions (P R N D L on automatic transmissions)

15. Car surfaces that reduce glare

16. Tires that meet government safety requirements, with safety rims

17. Exhaust-fume control or smog device

Safety can be built into new cars to protect you. It's included in the cost of your car.

But you need more safety than this. Look for these too, when you shop for a car:

1. Glove compartment doors and ash trays that don't flop open

2. Improved parking brakes you can use as an emergency brake

3. Anti-skid brake device

4. Headlights and taillights you can see from the sides of your car

5. No dangerous handles, knobs and ledges, tail fins (On the steering column, the thin ring that blows the horn is very dangerous)

6. Strengthened and improved bumpers

7. Roll bars inside the sides and top to keep a rolled-over car's top from collapsing (very important on convertibles and hard tops)

8. Improved protection for gasoline tanks

9. Body colors that don't blend into the background. (Experts say red and black are the most dangerous colors. They seem part of the distant scene in daylight. They disappear into the dusk.

The Federal Government is working now for safer cars. You can help get them for everyone when you shop for yours. Look for safety features on cars in the showroom. Ask your dealer about them. Use this as a checklist to start with; some experts list even more.

Automobile makers say they give the customer what he wants. Tell the dealer you want a safe car. He'll give the car manufacturer your message. If enough car buyers demand safe cars, they'll get them.

A WORD ABOUT TIRES:

Some experts think two-ply tires aren't safe. Some cars come to you with tires that aren't strong enough to carry a full load. For your safety, we suggest you ask for the next larger size in a four-ply tire.

Ask for our leaflets on "Tires" and "Used Cars".

We have money-saving references at our Consumer Centers. We invite you to visit us before you buy.

RX: FOR SAFE DRIVING -

TO ONE SAFER CAR ON SAFER ROADS
ADD ONE SAFER DRIVER.

So: Keep your car in safe condition -- tires, brakes, windshields

And DRIVE SAFELY --

- don't take chances
- watch out for the other driver
- fasten your seat belts
- obey all traffic laws
- don't speed
- don't drink when you drive.

WHEN YOU BUY

AUTO REPAIRS

Mechanical failures cause many auto accidents. Keep your car in good repair. Regular inspection and service by a reliable serviceman is your best protection. You'll drive safer and save your car. Here are some parts of your car that you should check:

1. Spark plugs should last 12,000 to 15,000 miles. But they need cleaning at 6,000 to 8,000 miles.

2. Distributor points last about as long as spark plugs. You should check them at the same time. New points may cost you $2 to $4. Labor is $3 to $5 more.

3. Tuneup may be needed when your engine misses or starts hard. This job includes replacing spark plugs, points, condenser, plus adjusting timing and carburetor. Parts cost from $9 (6-cylinder engine) to $12 (8-cylinders). Labor is another $10 to $15.

4. Carburetor may need overhaul when your engine sputters and runs unevenly. Perhaps only 1 or 2 parts must be replaced. But if you need another carburetor, don't buy a "rebuilt" one. It may not be very well "rebuilt." A new carburetor doesn't cost much more. A 2-barrel type costs less than a 4-barrel carburetor: $12 to $70.

5. Smog valve: check when you have a "lube" job. It needs regular servicing. You can do this yourself. A new smog valve may cost from $1.50 to $2.50.

6. Exhaust system: check regularly for leaks, rattles and stone damage.

7. Automatic transmission: check every 3 years or 30,000 miles. This job includes leakage and pressure checks, and a band-and-linkage adjustment. The job takes about an hour.

8. Brake cylinders: check if your brake pedal feels "spongy" when you step on it. Don't delay; your brakes may fail. It costs $16 to $25 for a new master cylinder, and $7 to $10 for each wheel cylinder. Ask for new parts; they last longer.

9. Brake drums may not need refacing if they're smooth and shiny; but sometimes heat can distort them. Check the drums for wear marks when the mechanic takes off the wheels. Drum-turning costs about $1.50 a wheel.

10. Brake linings may last 25,000 to 50,000 miles. After 20,000 miles, check this every 10,000 miles. New linings cost $30 to $40 a set, including labor.

11. Shock absorbers: replace after 30,000 miles. They are worn when the car bounces, or swerves on a turn. They cost $12-$15 each.

12. Front end alignment: needed if your front tires wear more (or more unevenly) than do your rear tires. The job costs $9 to $12.

13. Tire balancing: needed if your steering wheel shimmies when you drive fast. This job costs about $2 a tire.

14. Horn and windshield wipers: fix as soon as they fail. Wiper blades may last only a year.

15. Headlights alignment: needed every year. If the car's front end is bumped hard, the lights may be thrown out of line.

16. Tail lights, parking and other safety lights: check often. Ask someone to watch them while you work the lights. Replace burned-out bulbs right away.

Your auto mechanic has your life -- and your car -- in his hands. Be sure he's reliable. When you go in, tell him what you think needs to be done on your car.

Ask the mechanic how much the job will cost. If he finds more trouble, - and expense - ask him to phone you before he goes ahead. If you can go back to the garage, ask him to show you the bad parts - before he starts the job. (After may be too late for you to tell what's been done).

If your car doesn't work right after it's been repaired, take it back; speak to the manager. If your job was part of your new car warranty service, write the manufacturer, giving details.

IF IT ISN'T RIGHT --

If the garage won't make it right, tell your Better Business Bureau. Report any fraud to your local District Attorney. Write the Consumer Counsel, State Capitol, Sacramento. You can also write Automobile Consumers Protective Association, Star Route Box 10, Woodside, Calif., if you want to give or get information on a particular repair garage.

WHEN YOU BUY

Appliances

Major appliances (refrigerators, freezers, washing machines, ranges) take a big bite out of your income . . . so CHECK before you shop. And CHECK when you shop.

DECIDE WHAT YOU NEED

Talk it over with your family. How often will you use it? Where will you put it? (Be sure to measure the space you'll use before you shop.)

Is your house or apartment wired to take a new appliance? (Find out if you're not sure.) How many people will use it? Check the cost of the "extras": will you use them?

Now what about your future needs? Most appliances last 10 or 15 years: Will your family be bigger? Smaller? Remember: you don't save money by paying less now - if you have to replace it in 2 or 3 years.

And you are wasting money if you buy the "super deluxe" model with all the fancy "gadgets" . . . and don't need them.

One of a series of leaflets

on better buying and credit

DECIDE WHERE TO BUY

This is very important! Does your dealer have a well-equipped repair shop, factory-trained repairmen? Does he sell well-known brands? Will he still be there in 2 years - your appliance may need him then. How about 5 years - 10 years? These are important questions.

How about the price? Does it include delivery, installation, service? Or are these "add-ons" you don't know about until it's too late?

What kind of man is your dealer? Will he help you, and let you shop around? Does he try to "rush" you into something you're not sure about? Does he use "bait" to get you into his showroom - then try to sell you something that costs more? If he does,

WALK OUT AT ONCE!

Or does your dealer seem honest and fair, Will he help you, and let you shop around? Answer these questions before it's too late.

Find a dealer you can trust - then

SHOP CAREFULLY

Learn what are the "best buys". Read reports on makes and models. Study all labels and guarantees. Find out

1. who makes it
2. size
3. what it's made of
4. how to use it
5. how to care for and clean it
6. exactly what the guarantee means

Some organizations set standards and give seals of approval. Look for them.

The American Gas Association's Gold Star (This means that a gas appliance is safe.)

ASA (approved by the American Standards Association)

NEMA (approved by The National Electrical Manufacturer's Association)

UL (This means that electrical connections are safe)

A seal of approval doesn't mean it's a "best buy". A seal of approval means it's safe.

Do you think you're ready to buy now?

BE SURE

Did you compare prices and models? Did they show you how to use it? Do you know how to clean and care for it? (This can save you costly repairs.)

Is this the right time to buy? Or will there be a sale soon - to clear the way for new models.

Do you know the total price you're paying? If you're buying on time, do you understand the true annual interest rate? (Be careful of this one!)

Did you ask your credit union or a bank about a loan? (This almost always costs less than a loan from the dealer.)

Do you know what your guarantee means . . .? Will you get free service? NOW maybe you're ready to buy! GOOD LUCK.

WHEN YOU BUY

APPLIANCE REPAIRS

First step: Try to buy a brand and model that's been tested by a consumer group -- or by your friends and neighbors. And buy from a dealer who's been "tested," too -- find out what people think about the dealer before you buy. You don't want repair bills. Avoid them! Do you use your appliance correctly? Do you follow the manufacturer's manual? If you do -- you shouldn't need many repairs.

IF SOMETHING GOES WRONG -- DON'T PANIC! Before you call a repairman, check some things yourself. Did you plug it in? Is the fuse blown? Maybe you don't really need a repairman.

IF YOU CAN'T FIND THE PROBLEM -- you'll need help. Ask your friends for a good repair service. Or find out who the bad ones are!

RADIO OR TV NEED REPAIR?

Ask to see the repairman's registration certificate. Then you can protect yourself if something goes wrong.

See the back page of this leaflet: this service applies only to TV, phono and radio repairs. For other appliances, you're on your own.

IF YOU HAVE A WARRANTY

Read it! Is your appliance still covered? Does it tell you who to call? Maybe the repair won't cost you anything.

IF YOUR STORE CAN'T HELP YOU --

Call a Factory Authorized Serviceman. He's listed in the yellow pages. Look under "Washers" or "Refrigerators" or whatever. Make sure it's for the right brand.

Don't call the local "all purpose repair man". He'll probably charge you more -- and take longer to fix it. Few repairmen really know more than one or two brands well; distrust the advertisement that says "we service all brands." And the Factory Authorized Serviceman will probably guarantee the new parts. The local man probably won't.

FIND OUT ABOUT SERVICE CHARGES

Will he charge you just to come to your home? Maybe someone else will charge less. But watch out for "free" or "$1.00" service call operators. Most honest service men do charge a nominal amount for a call. $8 to $9 is a normal minimum. ($6 or $7 is reasonable to install a washer.)

without a written promise to put it back together and to bring it back free -- (or for a nominal delivery charge) if he can't fix it -- or if you don't ok the repair. You can be the victim of a vicious racket, if you don't have this promise in writing.

BEFORE THE REPAIRMAN BEGINS . . .

Get an estimate in writing. You may decide the job isn't worth it -- especially if your appliance is old. If you want to replace it instead, decide now -- not after the repair is done.

A complete shop overhaul for a washer should cost you less than $45, plus pickup and return. For a refrigerator, it should cost you less than $38 (if there's no need for a new evaporator or condenser).

ASK FOR AN ITEMIZED BILL

All parts and labor should be on it. And ask the repairman to show you the new parts. Make sure you really got them! Ask to see the old parts too.

ARE THE NEW PARTS GUARANTEED?

You should get a copy of the guarantee. If you have more trouble with your appliance, call the same repairman. Maybe his job wasn't good. He should make it good.

SOME TIPS TO SAVE WEAR

The cooler the kitchen, the longer your refrigerator will last. When you're on vacation, empty your refrigerator and put it on low -- don't disconnect. A combination washer-dryer isn't good for a large family.

Modern appliances are very complicated. You can't know all about them. So you must protect yourself!

KNOW . . . . who your repairman is, what he is doing to your appliance,
what you are paying for,
how much you will have to pay,
what the guarantee is.

CALL SOMEONE YOU CAN TRUST.

Repair Dealer Registration

California requires any radio, TV or phonograph repairmen to register with the bureau listed below. Don't let any dealer repair your set unless he has a registration certificate!

This Bureau can cancel registration of any service dealer who makes a misleading statement, if he knows it's not true. The same can happen to a dealer who makes a false promise, or is dishonest or negligent. Dealers must give each customer an invoice and a written estimate. Words like "guarantee," "seconds," "rebuilt" are strictly controlled. Picture tubes are graded "AA" (new), "B" and "C".

Anyone can file a complaint against a service dealer. The Bureau investigates, may suggest adjustment by the dealer. If the dealer refuses, the Bureau can take court action, force the dealer to meet certain standards, or fine him. Write to:

WHEN YOU BUY

RUGS & CARPETS

BE CAREFUL! Rugs and carpets cost plenty!
So . . . you can lose plenty.

Before you leave the house --

DECIDE WHAT YOU WANT

1. Where will you use it? Floors that you use a lot need a good grade of material. Remember...cheap material wears out so fast it can cost you more.

2. How big? Multiply the length of the space by the width. (Example: 9' long times 12' wide: 108) You need this figure when you shop.

3. What color? Will it "go" with the rest of your room? Medium color rugs look cleaner. Light ones show spots and stains. Dark ones show lint, threads, and dust.

4. What material? Most materials on the market are good if the rug is well made. READ THE LABELS. Ask your dealer about each material.

   WARNING: Don't let brags like "100% nylon pile" or "100% wool pile" impress you too much. If the rug is poorly made, it won't last long no matter what they make it of.

One of a series of leaflets

on better buying and credit

5. Wall-to-wall? You can't take it with you! If you plan to move in the next 10 years, forget wall-to-wall! You can move regular rugs; you can send them out to be cleaned.

6. Do you want an underlay? A good pad can add years to the life of the rug. A 40 ounce pad 1/4 to 3/8 inches thick is usually best.

Now you're ready to . . .

DECIDE WHERE TO BUY

There's no sure way to tell which dealers are honest...but here are some hints:

An honest dealer will

1. Have a showroom.

2. Deal in well-known goods.

3. Tell you about prices, fiber, the way its made.

4. Urge you to shop around before you buy.

5. Be in good standing in the business community (phone your Better Business Bureau if you're not sure).

An honest dealer will not

1. Use terms to confuse you like "broadloom" (this only tells the kind of loom the rug is woven on). Or "factory unit measurements" (there's no such thing).

2. Use "bait" to get you to buy. ("Bait" is a free gift--but of course you pay for it.)

3. Try to "switch" you to a rug that costs more than the one he put in his ad.

4. Pressure you to buy.

5. "Steal" your money by telling you you'll need a bigger rug than you really do.

6. Leave out delivery or other costs (or cost of the padding) when he tells you the "total" price.

Once you know what you want and where you want to buy it, you're ready to SHOP.

QUALITY

Look first at the cheapest rug. Bend it between your fingers. Does it seem flimsy? Can you see the backing between the fibers?

Now look at a more expensive one. See how closely packed the fibers are. This is called "density." Density is very important. The denser the rug, the better the rug. Try to choose the densest rug you can find at the price you can pay.

PRICE

There are few real "bargains". Watch our for the most expensive or the cheapest.

GENERAL RULE: Your rug should last a year for every dollar you pay per square yard. (If you pay $6 a square yard, it should last about 6 years.)

When you're ready to buy . . .

BE SURE you have a contract or sales slip that tells you:

1. Manufacturer's name or trade name.
2. Color of rug.
3. Fiber content of rug.
4. Installation cost.
5. Size of rug.
6. Price per square yard.
7. Description of pad.
8. Full contract price.

WARNING:

Never sign a contract that has any blank spaces in it.
If a salesman makes a promise, have them write it in the contract.

DON'T LET CREDIT TRAP YOU!

Stores, banks credit unions, loan companies all offer you credit. You can pay 12% - - - you can pay 42%! You need to know all you can. Then plan the way your family will use it.

MANAGE YOUR CREDIT . . . or it will manage you.

1. Are your monthly payments less than 20% of your take-home pay?

2. Do you have any cash on hand for emergencies?

3. Are your job and health prospects good?

4. Will buying on credit help you and your family - - not add worries and trouble?

If you answer "yes" credit can help you.

USE CREDIT FOR GOOD REASONS!

- To meet emergencies

- For necessities, not for luxuries

- For high-price items

- For goods and services you can use long after you finish your payments.

We have money-saving references at our Consumer Centers. We invite you to visit us before you buy.

KEEP YOUR CREDIT GOOD

This is a valuable asset. Your credit rating is based on:

- Character - your former payment habits.
- Capacity - your present ability to pay, shown by your income, responsibilities and debts.
- Capital - What you own.
- Collateral - what you offer as security.

KNOW THE COST OF CREDIT

You can measure the cost of consumer credit in two ways . . . dollar cost, and interest rate.

- Dollar Cost Subtract the cash price (or the cash you get) from the total amount you pay to the lender.

- Interest Rate Dollar cost compared to the money used or borrowed.

Dealers and lenders quote interest many different ways. Always ask for the true annual interest. Ask also for the total dollar cost. Then you'll know just how much you're paying for the loan.

KEEP THE COST DOWN

- Make as big a down payment as you can.
- Pay off the debt as fast as you can.
- Borrow only what you need.

KNOW THE KINDS OF CREDIT

There are two main kinds: retail credit - and cash loans.

There are many kinds of retail credit:

- Charge Accounts (30 and 90 day)
- Revolving Accounts
- Bank Revolving Accounts
- Installment Sales Plans

There are three main kinds of cash loans.

- Bank loans
- Finance Company loans
- Credit Union loans

SHOP FOR CREDIT

As we said before: you can pay 12% - you can pay 42%! It pays to shop around . . . the way you shop for a pair of shoes or a stove.

Here's how . . .

1. Get the cash price from several dealers.
2. Find out if there's a discount for paying cash.
3. Get the cost of loans from the dealers, a bank, a credit union, some finance companies.
4. Small payments and long contracts cost you money.
5. Compare full costs from all your sources.

Monthly payments may seem about the same. But over a year, a few cents turns into a few dollars. Don't pay more than you have to!

Generally, you'll find that	Annual Interest
- a credit union loan costs less	12%
- a bank loan is next	14.7%
- an installment plan costs more	18.5-19.5%
- a finance company loan costs most	24-42%

But a LOAN SHARK may cost you 100% or 200% or 1000%!

UNDERSTAND YOUR CONTRACT!

Contracts are legal documents. You're bound by what you sign. Remember these rules!

1. Read a contract carefully - small type, too - before you sign.
2. Don't sign if you don't understand!
3. Don't sign away your rights!
4. Be sure ALL blanks are filled in before you sign!
5. Get guarantees and service agreements in writing.
6. Know who you'll make payments to - the dealer or a loan company or a bank.

WHEN YOU BUY A TELEVISION

Keep your eyes open when you buy TV!

Before you Buy:

Visit several dealers-- look at several brands-- several price ranges

Try to buy your TV when the old models are being sold out--at a discount. This usually is in the spring. At any rate, read the written guarantee. Are parts-especially the picture tube guaranteed for 90 days only, or for a year? They should be guaranteed for at least a year.

Do you have to get a big, heavy TV set? A "portable" TV is one that has a carrying handle, even if it is rather heavy to carry. You can move a portable around the house. You can take it to the repair shop yourself. This can save you many $10 service charges.

Does the set give a clear, sharp picture? The picture should be crisp and in focus. The lines across the lighted picture tube should be sharp, and the same distance apart. You should be able to see small details in the picture, like the pattern on a vase.

One of a series of leaflets

on better buying and credit

When a scene jumps from a bright living room to a dark basement, can you still see the actors? Does an actor seem to gain weight as he walks across the screen? Do titles seem bulgy and distorted?

Does music sound clear and pleasing? Do voices sound natural? How big a set? In a small room, a small picture may look best. You have to get away from a large picture to see it well.

WHAT ABOUT COLOR TV?

Look twice -- think twice.

Color TV sets cost more than black-and-white TV sets. Special or discounted prices are harder to find. A portable color TV may cost you as much as a cabinet model ordinary TV.

Color TV also costs more to repair. It may need more frequent servicing than an ordinary TV. The color TV tube may cost you $150 to replace, compared to $50 for the same size black-and-white tube. Color TV also costs more to operate. Can you wait a while? Color TV sets will cost you less, and be better a year or two later.

But if you do find a color TV you like, try it out in your own home before you buy it. A tryout in the store won't tell you how it will work for your family, in your home. Does it work well, in your own home, with an indoor antenna on all local channels? Try to get a set that has UHF plus Channels 2 through 13. Are the tuning and picture adjusting knobs easy to use?

Does the set get black-and-white programs clearly? antenna? With ordinary adjusting of the knobs, can you get all local TV channels clearly?

Usually a small-screen TV gives you a sharper picture than a large-tube TV. Also, you may be located in an area where TV reception isn't too good.

A TV serviceman may have to adjust your new color set. If you need an outdoor antenna, he'll install and adjust it for best reception. Find out the cost of this before you buy.

WHAT ABOUT THE TV DEALER?

Shop for the best TV, the best price, the lowest cost. How much does the dealer charge if you buy your set over a period of months? Shop for credit. Check your credit union.

"No down payments" doesn't mean you're getting something for nothing. You're paying more "carrying charges" or more interest.

Often "no down payment" dealers have higher prices, use pressure tactics. Does the dealer advertise a "bargain", then try to switch you to a higher priced one? Does the dealer mark the cash price on each set? Or does he try to trick you with "$29.00 up"?

And read the sales contract. Are all blanks filled in? Do you know how much you'll have to pay each week or each month? And for how many months? What's the total cost in dollars?

After the guarantee period is up, you'll have to find your own repairman. Shop for him, too. Ask your neighbors who does good work. Always ask the repairman to tell you how much it will cost to fix your set before you tell him to go ahead on the job. Be sure he'll bring the set back to your home if you decide not to have him do the work.

Repair Dealer Registration

California requires anyone in the business of radio, TV or phonograph repair to register with the bureau listed below. He must list every business name and address. Don't let any dealer repair your set unless he has a registration certificate!

This Bureau can cancel registration of any service dealer who makes a misleading statement, if he knows it's not true. ADVISOR'S LEAFLET # 2

Produced by BAND
3009 16th St., Room 25
San Francisco, Cal. 94103
--- as a guide to better buying

RETAIL CREDIT... A HELP OR A TRAP?

IT'S UP TO YOU!

Stores are in business to sell . . . so they tempt and urge us to buy - buy - buy! And they make it so easy, with all sorts of "buy now, pay later".

Now, retail credit can be a helpful tool; you and your family can live more comfortably and conveniently. But you need to plan how to use it. If not, those "small, monthly payments" can push you into a bottomless pit of debt!

BEFORE YOU "BUY" RETAIL CREDIT . . . ASK:

1. Does the monthly payment fit your spending plan?

2. How long will the things you buy last?

3. How long will your income hold up?

4. What does the credit cost you? (Ask for the total cost in dollars.)

THE MOST COMMON KINDS OF STORE CREDIT ARE:

1. Open charge account - you pay the full amount at the end of the month. They don't charge you interest.

2. Revolving credit - (they often call it "easy payment" or "budget" plan). You charge anything you buy. Your monthly payments are set by what you owe. Some banks have this plan (like Bank Americard); you can buy at member stores, then pay the bank once, at the end of the month.

3. Installment plan - for big purchases like appliances. You make equal payments for several months.

WHAT KIND OF RETAIL CREDIT SHALL I CHOOSE?

Know the facts about all types of credit, then choose what's best for you. But remember, you always pay more when you buy on credit. The store may call it "service," "carrying charge" or just plain interest. (The 30-day open charge may not cost extra -- but check to be sure.)

Revolving Accounts -

1. Use for small items . . . clothing, housewares, notions.
2. Store limits what you can charge.
3. You agree to pay so much a month on what you owe. (Example: on a balance of $100, $10 a month.)
4. Store charges 1½% interest per month on the unpaid balance. Doesn't sound like much? Well, it's really 18% a year! So . . . if you owe $100, and pay $10 a month and charge $10 of merchandise each month, you pay $18 in interest over the year. And your debt is as high as ever!

Installment Accounts -

1. Use to buy big items - like a refrigerator or a stove.
2. You pay 18.5% to 19.5% interest per year. Don't be fooled by the dealer who says $10 interest per $100 per year.
3. You sign a contract, with equal payments over several months.
4. You receive the goods. Seller keeps the contract until you finish paying for it.
5. Watch out for added charges like notary fees . . . fire and credit insurance. You pay all these and the high interest rate!

IF YOU BELONG TO A CREDIT UNION: BORROW THERE . . . PAY THE DEALER CASH

Compare a $225 loan from a credit union for a year with a store's installment contract.

	INTEREST RATE		This costs you	You pay each month	You pay total
	"They say"	This means
Instal.	$10 per $100 per yr. on orig. debt	18.5%	$22.50	$20.62	$247.50
Credit Union	1% per mo. on unpaid balance	12.3%	$15.00	$20.00	$240.00

RULES FOR INSTALLMENT LOANS:

1. Make as big a down payment as you can. Pay back the rest as fast as you can.
2. Find out what the loan costs you in dollars.
3. Look for "NOTICE TO BUYER" before you sign any contract. It tells you your rights.
4. A contract is a legal document; you are bound by what you sign. READ CAREFULLY. Be sure ALL SPACES are filled.
5. Ask about any insurance charge. Find out what kind it is, and just what it covers.
6. Find out if your payments go to a bank or loan company. What reputation does it have?
7. Is penalty for late payment reasonable?
8. Are extra charges stated in the contract? (Notary fees, clerk fees, etc.)
9. Will you get a fair notice before they take item back?

10. Understand just what security you're giving. Don't give them the right to collect your salary through wage assignment.

11. Don't sign away your legal rights. Keep the right to refuse merchandise that's not what you wanted.

12. Do you get a refund if you make payments ahead of time?

THESE TRAPS ARE DEADLY IN REVOLVING ACCOUNTS!

1. Don't pay interest on small items . . . . groceries and soap and bobby pins.

2. Don't stay in debt all the time.

3. Don't open accounts all over town. $10 payments add up, when you have 4 or 5 of them.

4. Don't buy on impulse. Don't say "charge it" unless you really need it.

WHERE OH WHERE DOES YOUR MONEY GO?

You may not think it's fun to plan what you spend. But it can be! It's a kind of challenge -- a game you can win if you really want to.

AND it's the only way you'll ever find out where your money goes! Or where your money is taking you! Then you can decide what you want most. You can plan to get what you really want.

FIRST STEP:

Be honest with yourself.

Right down to the last penny.

WHEN YOU BUY FOOD

SHOP SMART AND SAVE

You can save $200 a year when you buy your food! Want to try it -- and find out for yourself? A $200 prize is worth a trial!

STEP ONE

PLAN AHEAD Write down what you want before you go to the store. You can get more food for less money if you shop once a week -- plan meals ahead and keep away from all the "goodies" you don't really want!

STEP TWO

KNOW WHEN TO BUY Read the newspapers. Find out what days of the week your supermarket has its sale . . . and SHOP THE SPECIALS then. Look for meats, fruits, and vegetables that are "in season". You can save lots. Don't take anything for granted! Be sure "featured", "special", and "cents off" items are really cheaper than they were last week. Sometimes they're not.

STEP THREE

READ LABELS Know what you're buying. Each package must say what's in it. There's always more of the first thing listed on the label than of the second. (If a can of hash lists "potatoes, beef", etc., there's more potatoes than beef.)

Some packages only look bigger. Check their weight. You may find you can get more for the same price by buying a different package. You may find the "giant economy size" costs more per serving than the smaller size. . . . SO BE CAREFUL!

STEP FOUR

PAY ONLY FOR WHAT's INSIDE Be sure you're paying for what's inside. Fancy wrappers, colorful displays, pink lights over the meat counter, handy "dump bins" -- all these "extras" only make the food look good. Remember: You can't eat the wrapper.

And don't forget the "extras" inside either. Chuck steak, for example, can have so much bone and fat it gives only two servings per pound . . . hamburger, for a few cents more, may serve four.

Just because you've seen a product on TV, doesn't always mean it's the best. In fact, a brand that costs less may be better.

See if there's a retailer's "STORE BRAND" at a lower price. Compare it with the manufacturer's national "NAME BRAND."

How do you tell a STORE BRAND?

Usually they're marked "packed for So-and-So's stores." If you can't tell ask the manager which are his STORE BRANDS. He'll be glad to tell you.

Also --
Most co-ops, large independents and chain stores have STORE BRANDS. Some stores have many different STORE BRANDS. Ask the manager which one is most like the NAME BRAND you like. Then try it and see.

It's your money you save, so speak up. STORE BRANDS almost always cost less than national NAME BRANDS. STORE BRANDS are often just as good.

Here are a few prices:

ITEM	NAME BRAND Price	STORE BRAND Price	Savings per Item
Instant coffee	$1.39	$1.15	24¢ (10 oz.)
Margarine	.27	.20	7¢ (1 lb.)
Salad dressing	.59	.45	14¢ (1½ pts.)
Orange juice (canned)	.59	.45	14¢
Canned peas	.23	.14	9¢
Canned tomatoes	.33	.20	13¢
Canned beets	.27	.17	10¢
Frozen peas	.27	.20	7¢
Aspirin, 5-gr.	.89	.19	70¢ (100)
Bufferin	1.39	.59	80¢ (100)
1-a-day vitamins	2.94	1.00	$1.94
Mayonnaise	.59	.53	6¢ (1½ pts.)
Toilet tissue	.37	.43	4¢ (4 roll)

Check the price stamped on each item. WATCH the checkers ring up your bill. Ask them to call your prices out loud. Be sure you pay only the lower SPECIAL price. It's easy to make mistakes!

Now you can relax -- all the way to the bank!

YOU CAN SAVE $200 A YEAR OR MORE IF YOU --

SHOP SMART!

WHEN YOU BUY

LIFE AND HEALTH INSURANCE

There are four kinds of insurance; most of us need some of each: Life insurance, Health Insurance, Auto Insurance, Fire Insurance. This leaflet tells you about the first two kinds.

LIFE INSURANCE

THREE SPECIAL NOTES

To Veterans: Keep your GI insurance paid up. This costs much less than what you'll pay anywhere else.

To Credit Union Members: Most credit unions carry group life insurance that adds a dollar of life insurance to every dollar you save (before age 55). Credit union loans are insured this way, too.

So, if you die every dollar you save is doubled; every dollar you borrow is paid off. This can make your credit union membership a very important part of your life insurance. Always check on this with your credit union.

To Employees and Union Members: Ask your employer or union office about group life insurance where you work. It almost always costs less than insurance you buy by yourself. But sometimes you can't take it with you when you change jobs.

Social Security is the start of a family's life insurance. Almost every worker has some social security life insurance, if he's married and has children. It usually is not enough to protect your family. The amount payable to your family depends on how much you earn and how long you've worked. Your employer, your life insurance agent or the Social Security Office can probably tell you what benefits you and your family have earned. Social Security insurance is a "BEST BUY".

Usually social security, GI (veterans) and group life all together aren't enough to take care of your family if you die.

When you buy individual life insurance, buy it first on the life of the ones who earn money for the family. This "protects" the rest of the family if he (or she) dies. Most families cannot afford to buy separate life insurance on the children. (If you think you can, think first about more insurance on the life of the "breadwinner".

Your family needs income if you die. One "BEST BUY" life insurance policy is the "family plan". This usually gives lifetime life insurance on the breadwinner, plus low-cost insurance on the wife and children -- all in one. Most companies make this plan very attractive to people who don't have a lot of money.

Here's the typical cost each year of a "Family Life Plan" for $5,000 of life insurance on the husband, plus from $1,000 to $2,500 insurance on the wife and $1,000 on each child. The cost depends on the husband's age.

Age 20 - $107	Age 30 - $131	Age 40 - $170
Age 25 - $117	Age 35 - $148	Age 45 - $198

If you pay more than this, you may be paying too much.

Your next best buy is a "whole life" or "ordinary life" policy on the breadwinner. It gives lifetime protection at low cost. Some of your premuim goes into a savings fund. A younger person (say, under 35) often gets all his money back if he pays premiums from then until he is 65. Here are typical costs each year:

Age 20 - $ 85	Age 30 - $109	Age 40 - $149
Age 25 - $ 95	Age 35 - $127	Age 45 - $177

You can also buy "term" insurance. This protects your family for a short period of time -- usually 5 or 10 years; sometimes you can renew for another 5 or 10 years, and then another 5 or 10 years. The cost goes up each time you renew. You'll pay much less for protection during your younger years, but you build up no savings fund. You can't renew past age 60 or 65.

Usually you can change to permanent insurance later on; if your income is low now, and you hope you'll earn more later, this may be a good way to start. You can buy a lot more protection for your family right now, but it may cost you more over a 20 or 30 year period. $5,000 for five-year renewable term insurance may cost you, each year:

Age 20 - $ 31	Age 30 - $ 33	Age 40 - $ 45
Age 25 - $ 32	Age 35 - $ 37	Age 45 - $ 59

Low-income families never can afford "endowment" life insurance. That's the kind that promises to pay you $1,000 or $5,000 at the end of 20 years or at some future age, like 65. Your family gets much less protection for what you spend than with other kinds. (Salesmen usually make more money when they sell this kind.)

If your life insurance total (all these kinds added together) is at least 5 times your yearly income, You've protected your family more than most people do.

HEALTH AND ACCIDENT INSURANCE

That's the general name for hospital insurance, insurance to pay doctor's fees, or insurance that pays you so much a week if you're sick or injured.

Very few families, even with fairly good incomes, can afford to buy individual insurance of this kind. Watch out for the mail order insurance companies that seem to promise to cover all these medical espenses for only a few dollars a year. These policies usually are filled with escape clauses. They may pay you only for certain kinds of illness or accidents. They may pay nothing at all for the things that are most apt to happen to you.

Your "BEST BUY" is to sign up with your employer, your union, or your co-op for group health insurance. Always check for this first. A group health plan that has its own clinic or hospital often is your best buy; such a group often includes the special skills of many kinds of doctors.

About Mutual Funds

A savings account for emergencies, and enough life insurance to protect your family -- these come first. After that, (and after auto and fire insurance) -- only then should you think about mutual funds. Most low-income consumers probably shouldn't invest in them.

A SMALL LOAN?

WHERE DO YOU GO?

You may need a small loan for a good reason:

- To pay taxes or doctor bills.
- For a high-priced appliance.
- For goods that last long after you finish your payments.
- To combine many debts into one.

Usually, you can borrow . . .if:

- You've a steady job and good health.
- All of your monthly payments are less than 20% of your take home pay.
- You have some cash laid aside.

But . . . where do you go?

Check on these:

1. Finance Companies

   A. They lend on your signature or on a chattel mortgage. (This means you "own" the goods, but they can take the goods and sell them, if you don't pay on time.)

B. Interest rates run from 2% to $3\frac{1}{2}$% a month on the unpaid balance. True annual rate is 24% to 42%! Watch out for extra service charges, too

C. You pay back once a month. Payments should be equal. Watch out for "balloon" notes . . . the last payment is a big one; you may have to take out another loan!

2. Credit Union

A. A co-operative organized by people with a common interest . . . employee groups, churches, clubs, people who live in the same area.

B. Makes small loans at low interest rates to members. The highest rate is 1% a month on the unpaid balance. True annual rate is 12%. There are no extra service charges.

C. To join, you invest in one or more $5 shares. You can pay in 25¢ per week, more if you want to.

D. Your credit union lends on your good name - or on the shares you own, or a chattel mortgage; sometimes you need a cosignor.

E. How much your Credit Union lends, and for how long, depends on the Credit Union. You pay back equal monthly payments.

3. Bank

A. Lends to persons who can meet their credit rules. These usually are much stiffer than those of a Finance Company or a Credit Union.

B. Interest rate for unsecured consumer loans is usually about $8 on each $100 borrowed. They may call this an "8% loan". True annual rate is 14.7%.

C. You pay it back in equal monthly payments.

Who you borrow from depends on you . . . .
but - - usually:

	Annual Interest
- a credit union loan costs less	12%
- a bank loan is next	14.7%
- a finance company loan costs you much more	24-42%

But a LOAN SHARK can cost you 100% or 200% ..... or 1000%!

We have money-saving references at our Consumer Centers. We invite you to visit us before you buy.

USE CREDIT WISELY . . . .

1. Know the total cost of credit in dollars and true annual interest rates. Get the best buy you can.

2. Check on loans from many sources.

3. Borrow only what you need. Pay the loan back as soon as you can: you pay less interest.

4. Save to buy when you can - - and wait to buy it.

5. Don't borrow more than you can pay back.

6. And before you sign a contract, be sure you understand it.

   - READ IT CAREFULLY - small type too.
   - Be sure all figures are filled in.
   - Be sure you know how much the loan costs, and when you must pay it back.
   - Know what happens if you miss a payment.

TO: All Local Unions in Northeast Arkansas

SUBJECT: Special Educational Institute
"Eastern Arkansas: Its Unions, People, and Problems"

Dear Sir and Brother:

In cooperation with the Southern Regional Council, we are planning to hold an Educational Institute this coming July 14th and 15th at the Holiday Inn in Jonesboro, Arkansas. The program will begin Friday evening at 7:00 p.m. and run through Saturday.

All local union officers, Executive Board members, Stewards and other leadership in your local union are invited.

This program is designed to bring local union leaders important information about the problems and possibilities in a changing South and in a developing Eastern Arkansas. The state's tax needs and tax problems will be discussed --especially as they relate to working men and women. Also important issues concerning consumer protection, including such matters as credit and garnishment, will be considered.

This institute will help bring new insight to problems facing Arkansas and suggest constructive ways that unions and other groups can work cooperatively for better life for all of our people.

Outstanding experts and labor educators will be on hand to work with us on this fine program. Your union should make plans now to have a good delegation attend these sessions.

We will be looking forward to seeing you then.

Always with a good wish, I remain

Fraternally yours,

Bill Becker

Dear Art:

First, it was good to have been with you for your Education Conference. I enjoyed teaching the groups that I had. Thanks for your hospitality and especially for the wonderful seafood dinner.

Sometime in our conversations I believe you asked about our Voter Education Project's funding of registration efforts in Florida. On checking I find that in 1968 fifteen grants were made in widely distributed areas across the state. There are now new guidelines for making grants but where an applying group and the local situation meets the standards set a local application will be given serious attention.

Best personal wishes.

Dear Emory:

I should have written to you before now to thank you for participating in our COPE Seminar. I know from some of the conversations I overheard, you at least "caught their ears" and certainly made them think. I don't believe they all agree, but I know we made some progress!!

I'm pleased to hear that the Council did make some grants in Florida, and I do agree that standards must be made and adhered to.!!

Thanking you again for your contribution to our program, and looking forward to seeing you in the near future, I am with best personal regards

Sincerely,

Dear Bill:

This letter follows our conversation in Tampa a few days back. What I would like to propose to you and the other officers of the Florida AFL-CIO is a two day educational institute to be held later in the spring. The details of subject matter can be worked out cooperatively at a later date.

After looking at my calendar here I realized that you would not be able to set your Board meeting for April 9 - Easter week end. I assume it will be on the 16th. As you know, I will be with the Virginia AFL-CIO for an education program that week end. If you need further information please phone or write. Perhaps if the state officers agree that a trial program would be a good idea, you would like for arrangements to be made directly with the unions or central bodies in an area you select. I could give some assistance in this regard as well.

The attached statement will supply more information on the purposes and program for the proposed institute.

Please let me hear from you at your earliest opportunity as to what next steps you think it advisable for me to take. I look forward to the opportunity to work with you and the Florida AFL-CIO.

Sincerely,

Emory F. Via

"DEMAND THE UNION LABEL"

Dead Labor Project — Program

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL UNDERSTANDING OF UNION LEADERS

PROPOSAL FOR AN INSTITUTE

Purpose of Institute.

The purpose of the Institute is to provide an educational program for a selected group of union leaders which will increase their understanding of current economic and social changes. Primary emphasis will be placed on how such changes relate to unions. Special attention will be given to race relations as a part of the changing scene in American life. Based on past experience, we believe that such training can make union leaders more effective within their organizations and in their communities. Both of these things, in turn, will contribute toward more effective unions.

Possible Subjects.

The subjects which might be included in an Institute are quite varied. Although any one Institute would focus on only two or three subjects, the topics may be selected from the following suggestions (other topics are quite possible):

Perspectives on the South of 1966

Economic Problems of the South

The Impact of Reapportionment on State Politics

The Civil Rights Movement -- in the Nation and in the State

Case Studies in Southern Union Civil Rights Problems

Understanding the Local Community

The Union's Role in Poverty Programs

Union Administration

Labor Problems

The Civil Rights Law -- What It Says and How It is being Interpreted

Developments in the Field of Civil Rights

Southern Labor History
Changing Southern Voting Patterns
Negro-Union Political Coalitions
Labor's Role in Politics

Alternate Approaches.

Two different approaches as to the selection of subjects for an Institute are offered. In each case thought should be given to which approach better suits the needs of the unions in the area where the conference will be held. The first approach places primary emphasis on civil rights and related matters. It would be understood that the interests of the group were such that they would welcome an opportunity to concentrate on these kinds of problems as they relate to unions and their community. In general, this approach would be used in situations where unions are more advanced in their dealings with such problems and/or where they have accepted that it is important for them to meet race relations problems more directly or to find constructive ways of improving community relations and their relations with Negro organizations.

The second approach would put the main emphasis on general union courses such as union administration, labor problems, or labor's role in politics. Such materials that deal with civil rights would be introduced in the natural context of such courses. In other words, the leaders participating in such a program would find out how these problems relate to their on-going interests as unionists.

Actually, there is a third approach which might well emerge here, and that is some combination of the two outlined above.

An argument that has a good deal of merit is to use the second, or more general, approach. Unions must be interested in a whole range of problems in the modern world. Many unionists now recognize the relation between broader economic and social issues to collective bargaining. There is no doubt that Southern economic and social problems are affected by racial relations and by new views and actions related to civil rights. Given this kind of situation can local union leaders gain greater understanding of race relations developments by considering them as they relate to other matters of interest to unions? In any case, the approach and particular subjects can be worked out cooperatively between the Labor Program and the sponsoring union group.

Faculty and Staff Assistance.

The Southern Regional Council's Labor Program will assist fully in arranging for an appropriate faculty for the Institute. Staff assistance will also be available for planning and promotion.

The faculty will be drawn from qualified experts from the Council, universities, public agencies, civil rights groups, and the labor movement. Such faculty will be a matter of mutual agreement between the sponsoring group and the Labor Program. The faculty proposed by the Labor Program will, in the main, be persons who understand and accept the labor movement, know the fields in which they are asked to teach, and who are able to teach union leaders.

The Labor Program will cooperate fully with AFL-CIO departments and will work especially closely with the Departments of Civil Rights and Education.

Financing.

In general there will be no charge for the planning and administrative services provided by the Labor Program. In some cases, especially in a first program, very substantial financial assistance can be given in securing an appropriate faculty. Certain mailing costs, costs of rooms, housing (where required), transportation of delegates (where required), and lost time (if needed) would be born by the sponsoring unions or participating individuals. In general this will mean that programs of high quality and interest can be sponsored at a minimum cost.

Size and Location of Institute.

The Institutes are not intended to reach a large number of persons so much as to reach a selected group of leaders who can profit from a serious education program. In general it would be good to have from twenty to thirty persons attending an Institute. Under special circumstances a smaller or larger group will be considered.

The location of the Institute should conform to the best judgment of the union leadership as to convenience and interest.

It would be possible to have a conference in each of several areas. In this event careful thought should be given to using a different approach appropriate to the particular section of the state.

About the Southern Regional Council's Labor Program.

The Labor Program was established in September, 1965. It is under the direction of Emory F. Via who is on leave from the University of Wisconsin's School for Workers. The program was set up in cooperation with the National Institute of Labor Education in Washington, D. C. Both the NILE and the SRC receive financial support from the AFL-CIO.

An advisory committee to the Labor Program is being established which is composed of the labor-related members of the SRC Board plus a representative each from the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Department and the National Institute of Labor Education. These members are:

Labor-connected SRC Board members:

William Becker, President, Arkansas AFL-CIO

Hank Brown, President, Texas AFL-CIO

Claude Ramsay, President, Mississippi AFL-CIO

Paul Christopher, Director, Region VIII, AFL-CIO

James Youngdahl, Labor Attorney, Little Rock, Arkansas.

National Institute of Labor Education member:

Joseph Mire, Director, NILE.

Dear Emory:

This brief note comes to thank you for all that you did to help make the 1966 Kentucky Labor School a success.

We are all deeply grateful and indebted to you, not only for your help and excellent teaching services, but for your promotion of good fellowship in the group. I truly hope your services will again be available to us for future schools or institutes.

Since returning to the office, I have received numerous letters and telephone calls of congratulations upon having a fine school this year. A great portion of this usccess was due to the very fine work of the faculty.

Again I say thanks for a job well done and a fine contribution to the labor movement in Kentucky.

Dear Henry:

Under separate cover I am sending you a group of materials from the labor education programs of Indiana University, the University of Minnesota, Ohio State University, University of Iowa, University of Michigan-Wayne State University, and the University of Wisconsin. The materials will give you and the University of Kentucky some idea of what labor education programs offer. Unfortunately, in most cases you do not have a complete description of any one program. And you will need to check each material to see just what it is describing. For instance, in some cases it's describing just an extension class in one community, in another case it might be describing a resident program at the University itself, and in still another it may be descriptive of special one-week institutes. Rutgers did not respond to my request for materials so I cannot send you anything from that school. Herb Levine, Labor Education Center, Institute of Management and Labor Relations, Rutgers University, New Brunswick, New Jersey, may be able to send you something about the program there. I do have single copies of some materials from about four other universities which I could share with you if need be. However, I believe the ones that you will receive from me are fairly representative. I am especially sorry that the School for Workers pamphlet (University of Wisconsin) which describes its total program and some of its philosophy is no longer available.

You asked that I send my expenses incurred due to my participation in the Kentucky Labor School to you. They are as follows:

Air fare (Nashville to Lexington; Lexington to Atlanta)	$ 49.72
Ground transportation	11.60
Meals (Extra or in transit)	8.06
Miscellaneous expenses in connection with the School	10.55
TOTAL:	$ 79.93

The honarium which we discussed, $200.00, will be fine.

Let me thank you for a number of acts of courtesy and hospitality which you extended to me during my stay in Lexington. It was good to get to be with you more and to get to know the Kentucky Labor School firsthand.

Please be in touch with me if there is anything further I can do to be of service.

Give my regards to Sam.

Best personal wishes.

THE ROLE OF LOCAL UNION OFFICERS AT THE UNION MEETING

The Chairman

The chairman of the meeting and the local union president are usually the same person. However, this person's responsibilities as chairman and as president are somewhat different. As local president, it is his duty to provide leadership and to carry out the policy established by the membership. As chairman of the meeting, it is his duty to preside as an impartial moderator. This distinction should be observed by the chairman; if he believes that it is necessary for him to speak on an issue, he should surrender the chair and speak as one of the group.

The chairman's job is to "stimulate and moderate":

- see that the rules are observed;
- keep the meeting moving;
- encourage participation from the floor;
- make sure that members understand what's going on;
- explain his rulings.

The Recording Secretary

The recording secretary is in a position to do much to improve the quality of union meetings:

- keep accurate minutes, taking the necessary time to make sure that motions are recorded properly;
- have available all items of unfinished business, tabled motions, and postponed motions;
- work with the Executive Board in deciding which communications should be read in full, which summarized, and which simply filed;
- read roll call, minutes, and communications clearly;
- present the recommendations of the Executive Board.

(Some organizations mimeograph the minutes and pass them out to the members at the beginning of the meeting)

The Financial Secretary

- keep accurate records of the financial affairs of the local;
- make regular reports;
- explain any unusual aspects of the reports;
- indicate a willingness to answer questions on the report
- some locals make a practice of mimeographing the monthly and/or annual report and passing it out to the membership.

You did indeed present the topic just as I hoped you would. There were many favorable comments -- no doubt the majority now view the problems of welfare from an entirely different slant.

We are grateful for your contribution, not only for the fine manner in which you presented the subject, but also for taking time from a busy schedule to come to Texas.

If we can ever be of service to you or your organization, please let us know.

Dear Julian:

Let me bother you once again regarding the Minimum Wage Kits. Your count showed that you were short 57 kits. The one question that remains is whether or not you received all four cartons in our last shipment.(April 20).

If you have received all four cartons we will ship you the missing 57 kits. However, if you only received three cartons we would like to continue checking with REA regarding the shipment.

I am sorry for this difficulty and appreciate your cooperation in attempting to settle it. It was indeed good to get to see you and hear you at the recent conference in Virginia.

Best personal wishes.

Recd 9-29-69

AUGUST VIRGINIA STATE AFL-CIO 1969

HOWELL WINS RIGHT TO RUN-OFF

MAKES STRONG SHOWING

CARRIES SIX OUT OF TEN DISTRICTS

State Senator Henry Howell made a "surprising show of strength" in the July 15th, Democratic Primary. Coming within less than 5,000 votes of defeating Charlottesville Attorney William Battle, Howell earned the right to call for a run-off primary election.

The politicians and newspaper reporters had predicted that Battle would receive almost 50% of the vote. This simply was not the case. On election day the moderate was only able to poll 38% of the vote, while Senator Howell polled 37%.

It is significant to note that Henry Howell carried six out of ten congressional districts and almost every urban area of the state. Howell also carried the rural 4th District, which is the home of both Governor Godwin and Congressman Watkins Abbitt.

Battle's only real strength lies in the western portion of the state where he has been able to pick up all of the old "Byrd" voters. Battle is now considered the leader of the "moderate wing" of the Byrd Machine. The voters in every major metropolitan area of the state made it clear that they are tired of the Byrd Machine brand of politics in Virginia. They want to keep the big boys honest.

During the first primary, Senator Howell conducted a positive campaign. He asked for the votes of the people of Virginia based on his record of service. His theme, "Keep the big boys honest!", had a special meaning to the thousands of voters who turned out for him. They know that Henry Howell had been working for the "little people" long before he decided to run for governor. They knew that, unlike Bill Battle, Henry Howell was interested in the consumer prior to the election year of 1969. They knew that it was Henry Howell who fought the poll tax...and won; fought the insurance companies...and won; fought the large utility companies...and forced them to lower their rates. It was Henry Howell who fought for one man-one vote. It was Henry Howell who sued two governors of Virginia...and won for the people, eleven million dollars annually for education. Henry Howell has had the courage to speak out for the average man when others were silent.

Senator Howell has promised that when he becomes governor he will eliminate the tax on food and patent medicines. This unfair tax, which was levied by the Godwin Administration, is a burden on the poor people in our state and it is unnecessary.

On the other hand, we have Bill Battle, of Charlottesville. His theme is "the sensible choice." Mr. Battle has never been elected to public office. He had never served his city or his state in any official capacity. However, his father was governor 20 years ago...and was also a strong supporter of the Byrd Machine. Mr. Battle is a lawyer who represents the "big boys," including VEPCO. He has the support of big business and the Byrd Machine, including Mills Godwin.

It is obvious to just about everyone that a deal has been made between Battle and the "big boys". Battle says that it is not "sensible" to eliminate the tax on food and medicine....and yet most other states manage very well without this unfair tax. Indeed, the only people who find Battle "the sensible choice" are the "big boys."

Now that Henry Howell has proven that he has strenght throughout Virginia, it will be easier to get the votes of those who were for him, but didn't vote because they thought Howell didn't have a chance. On July 15th, the people made it clear that Henry Howell is their choice. And on August 19th, they will return to the polls in overwhelming numbers to insure that Henry will be the Democratic nominee for Governor of Virginia.

MEAT CUTTERS WIN VICTORY

The Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of North America, AFL-CIO, have won in their strike against the Lorenz Neuhoff Company. The Don't Buy campaign on Frosty Morn and Valleydale meat products is over.

In a letter to all state branches, the President of the Meat Cutters stated that the agreement calls for the return of the strikers, the checkoff of union dues, very substantial increases in pay, and the other usual benefits that union contracts provide.

The "Don't Buy" campaign has been lifted completely and there is no further antagonism against the Neuhoff Company.

THE LABOR ENDORSEMENT

an editorial

The Virginia State AFL-CIO's Program of Progress was on the line in the July 15th Democratic Primary. In past years in Virginia, the politicians have contended that the labor vote in our state was not very significant. As one politician put it, "In Virginia, the endorsement of organized labor is the kiss of death.....". And so it was ...before the Program of Progress. But things have changed!! There are now COPE offices in every district in Virginia. With the help of finances made available through the Program of Progress the COPE organizations are just beginning to realize the rewards for all their tireless efforts.

Working together, the affiliates of the Virginia State AFL-CIO have organized a sizable political force which in future elections will "have to be reconed with." Never before have the Committees on Political Education worked harder than in the July 15th Democratic Primary.

And to those who would still doubt the political strength of organized labor in this state in 1969, let them look again at the July 15th election returns!! It shocked the "big boys" when Henry Howell carried the cities of Lynchburg, Newport News and Covington. It astonished all the political pros when Howell did so well in Chesterfield County..and carried small towns such as Front Royal, Franklin, and Salem.

If the "big boys" want another shock, let them check the rolls of organized labor in these areas carried by Henry Howell.

The paperworkers in Covington and Franklin; the tobacco workers in Petersburg, Chesterfield, andRichmond; the textile workers in Front Royal, Lynchburg, and Fredericksburg; the steelworkers and building trades in Roanoke and Salem; the retail clerks, the meatcutters; the communication workers, the machinists, the engineers, the clothing workers, the rubberworkers, the maritime unions, the goverment employees...all are to be congratulated for a job well done.

LT. GOVERNOR POLLARD WILL NOT ENDORSE BATTLE

In choosing not to endorse either Sen. Henry Howell or William Battle in the August 19 Democratic gubernatorial run-off, Lt. Gov. Fred Pollard has demonstrated a degree of intelligence sorely missing from the Virginia political scene. Unlike Gov. Godwin, who apparently feels that Virginians must be told whom to vote for, Fred Pollard has chosen to let the voters make their own decisions.

Fred Pollard is to be commended for having waged an honest and above-board campaign (as opposed to the dubious tactics employed in what appears to be a game of spin-the-Battle). He campaigned on those issues which he felt to be important to the people of Virginia and on a record of many years of service to Virginia. In view of these facts, Gov Godwin's endorsement of Battle seems to come as a slap-in-the-face to Pollard. Godwin declined to endorse any candidate while his Lt. Governor was in the running, but as soon as Fred Pollard was eliminated from the race, Godwin endorsed Bill Battle.

Sen. Howell has expressed his approval of Pollard's position of neutrality in the upcoming run-off. Fred Pollard has clearly indicated that he wants no part of machine politics or political "deals" that are designed to manipulate public opinion and voters' attitudes. Henry Howell, in praising Pollard for assuming this position, also leveled an attack against machine politics and expressed his desire to see the voters of Virginia make their voices heard.

It is virtually impossible to say whether the majority of Fred Pollard's 95,000 primary votes will go to Henry Howell or William Battle. It does seem likely, however, that those Pollard supporters who are concerned about integrity in government and believe that government must be responsive to the people will support the candidacy of Sen. Howell.

EFFECTIVE COOPERATION BETWEEN UNIVERSITIES AND UNIONS IN LABOR EDUCATION

I. Premises:

Universities can, and should, render genuine educational services to organized labor groups, just as they have been rendering such services for many years to business, farmers and other functional groups in our society. These services are provided in undergraduate and graduate schools of businesses; in agricultural colleges and a vast program of agricultural extension; in professional schools of various kinds, and through specialized training in a variety of fields.

University-labor cooperation in the field of education must take place in a climate of mutual respect and confidence. It must be predicated upon a sincere acceptance by the university of the broad goals of unionism and the processes of collective bargaining as a vital and integral part of a democratic society.

Further, it requires of universities an acceptance of the principles and methods of workers education and of its institutional channels within the unions. And it requires of unions a recognition of the need of universities to maintain objectivity, intellectual integrity, and standards of teaching.

II. Scope:

The purpose of labor education is to better equip union leaders, potential leaders and interested members as trade unionists and citizens. Education can provide training in specific skills and background knowledge which will be useful in the operation of the union, and in the relationship between unions and the rest of society.

It is doubtful that any practical line can be drawn at this time between the appropriate spheres for university labor education programs and those conducted directly by the unions. There are a few training goals clearly outside the province of university labor education, such as the building of loyalty to a specific union or the implementation of a specific political action program. On the other hand there are some subject matter areas clearly appropriate for university workers education, such as broad general education, teacher and leadership training, learning which has to do with the growth and development of individuals rather than organizations, and experimental efforts in techniques, materials and new subject matter.

The specific program of any university will depend on the needs of the unions as expressed in the cooperative relationships described below, and on the specific interests and compentences of the university. In general, universities should not attempt to do what unions can and ought to do for themselves. The most creative relationships are between strong union-supported education programs and equally strong programs of universities. University participation in labor education should enhance and elevate the overall program, but not substitute for the work of the unions themselves. When the university works with unions which have not developed their own programs, a major objective of the university should be to encourage this development.

III. Administration:

The labor education program should have an identity of its own within the university. This is necessary even when the program is located within an industrial relations center or as part of an extension division. It does require specialized staff familiar with the problems of labor education and willing to accept a cooperative relationship between the union and the university. This staff should be knowledgeable about trade unionism and its problems, experienced in all pahses of adult education for workers and able to administer and conduct a varied program with competence and imagination. Both the program and the staff should have recognition within the university because of the importance of the work, and not as a by-product of other accomplishments, such as research or publication.

Participation in workers education classes is almost invariably voluntary. Therefore, a university program, as a matter of policy and in order to be effective, must involve unions and workers closely in its planning and conduct. This cooperative relationship should apply to the specific activities, but more important, to the over-all program. This last can be best assured through the establishment of an advisory committee to the labor education program. The following guideposts for the operation of such a committee are suggested.

The committee should include representatives of the university and of labor unions. (When the labor education program is part of a joint labor-management institute or department of the university, there is often a committee including management, unions and the public advising on the total program. In such instances there should be a separate committee advising on the labor education program, made up of union and university representatives.) The committee should be large enough to be representative, but not so large as to be unwieldy. Selection of the labor representatives should be the result of a consultative process between the university and the representative body of the labor movement in the area being served. In the case of state universities the state central body is the logical channel for the cooperative effort. Universities serving only a local area might deal with local central bodies in the area being served; those universities with a national concern should keep this in mind in the establishment of their committees. A number of universities have found a successful procedure in selection of labor members of advisory committees to consist of nomination by the responsible central labor body and appointment by the university. The union representatives should include a combination of responsible union officials, representatives of international unions with sizeable membership in the area, and union education professionals from the area if such are available. There should also be some representation on the committee of union educators with national experience so as to encourage the sharing of experiences throughout the country.

Both the union and university representatives on the advisory committee have the responsibility for the success of the program. This is best accomplished when a creative relationship is established, bound together by a common concern. In this way the committee can be more than a watch-dog for the labor movement or a promotional agency for the university. Some specific functions of the committee follow:

1. Interpretation to the university of the educational needs of the labor movement. This includes the types of programs, the teachers and the materials to make the programs effective, and the geographical areas for activity. This should include the administrative relationships between the university and the unions, and problems of cost.

2. Serving as an opportunity for the review of university proposals. In the operation of the program it is expected that ideas will come from both sides. The joint meetings will encourage this, and serve to test them.

3. Interpretation of the university program within the labor movement, including the promotion of university labor education activities.

4. Helping to interpret the program in the community so that there is public understanding of the role of the university in labor education.

5. Building support for the program within the university, including adequate financing.

6. Providing an opportunity for interchange of ideas which will lead not only to experiments in education, but also to research opportunities of mutual concern.

IV. Costs:

University labor education programs are sufficiently important that university funds should be available for their support. This support should include administrative expenses and at least part of instructional costs. Public funds or endowments provide the bulk of the funds for college and university education. There is no reason why they should not meet an equivalent share of the cost of labor education activity.

11:00 EVALUATION AND DISCUSSION OF CONFERENCE

INTRODUCTION

An evaluation form for the Upper South Conference was prepared by by the Virginia Polytechnic Institute Labor Education Program for completion by conference delegates. Delegates were asked to complete it during the morning session on September 8. The results represent just over a 50 percent sample because some delegates had to leave early in order to return to their homes some distance from Roanoke.

GENERAL

1. Physical arrangements (rooms, seating, etc.) for this conference could be described best as:

   EXCELLENT 32 SATISFACTORY 19 POOR 1

2. Will the subjects discussed in this conference be useful to you and to your local union?

   YES 50 NO 0

WORKSHOP SESSIONS

1. The instructors in the workshops were:

   WELL PREPARED IN THEIR SUBJECTS 43

   FAIRLY WELL PREPARED 4

   COULD HAVE BEEN BETTER PREPARED 1

2. The materials distributed in the workshop sessions were:

   USEFUL AND GOOD FOR FUTURE REFERENCE 48

   INDIRECTLY USEFUL FOR THE TOPIC 2

   OF LITTLE VALUE 0

3. Was sufficient opportunity for discussion provided?

   YES 49 NO 0

4. The workshop discussion can be described best as:

HELPFUL IN UNDERSTANDING THE TOPIC	46
SOMETIMES USEFUL	6
OF LITTLE VALUE	0

INSTRUCTORS

Each delegate was asked to rate the instructors in the three workshop sessions that he attended. The totals for each instructor differ because of varying numbers of students in each workshop.

INSTRUCTOR (TOPIC)	EXCELLENT	GOOD	FAIR	POOR
ROBINSON (GRIEVANCES)	26	10	0	0
REMSEN (ARBITRATION)	27	12	0	0
WALKER (LABOR HISTORY)	19	12	0	4
DERNONCOURT/SWAITY (ORGANIZING)	16	6	1	1
WEISER (ASSIGNMENTS)	9	8	4	0

Although the delegates were instructed to rate the instructors and not the subject, the evaluation of Professor Walker seems to reflect, in part, disinterest in his topic on the basis of discussions with delegates. These same discussions indicated that Mr. Weiser's rating may reflect some difficulty in understanding him on the part of some delegates because comments were generally favorable on his presentation.

SUGGESTIONS FOR FUTURE

Space was provided on the evaluation form for suggestions by the delegates of topics that might be considered for future conferences. Delegates were asked "What topics would you like to see included in future programs?" There were three responses that stated simply a desire for more of the same. With a few exceptions, the other responses seemed to say essentially the same thing:

GRIEVANCE PROCEDURE	11
ORGANIZING	8
LABOR HISTORY	7
ARBITRATION	8
POLITICAL ACTION	2
WORK ASSIGNMENTS	1

However, some suggestions were made for other topics that might be offered in the future:

LABOR EDUCATION	4
OFFICER TRAINING	2
REACHING MEMBERS	2
TIME STUDY	2
SOCIAL SECURITY	1
INSURANCE	1
CONSUMER PROBLEMS	1

GENERAL COMMENTS

Finally, space was provided for any general comments by the delegates. These general comments indicated that delegates (1) liked the food, (2) desired tables to work on during the workshops, and (3) hoped that future sessions might end earlier in the afternoon.

In summary, the comments were generally very favorable on all of the aspects of the conference. The criticisms made are of a type that can be easily corrected.

Mr. Emory Via

Dear Emory:

I am pleased to advise you that a Labor Education Program was established at Virginia Polytechnic Institute on July 1, 1968, as a part of a Business Extension program offering extension education to labor, industry and government through the College of Business. The Labor Education Program is financed and administered by the Extension Division and the College of Business cooperatively. The overall Director is Dr. John D. Richardson and the Labor Education Program Director is Dr. James W. Robinson.

The Labor Education Program is designed to provide (1) educational conferences, short-courses, and institutes, both on and off campus, for the members of organized labor in Virginia; (2) meaningful research on manpower issues; and (3) a liaison between unions desiring assistance in their educational programs and those faculty members capable of providing such assistance.

In an effort to establish the most comprehensive and effective program in labor education it is considered advisable to establish a Labor Advisory Committee. I am happy to inform you that I am recommending to the appropriate administrative officials at VPI that you be considered as an appointee to that committee. I trust that you will be able to accept. The meetings of the committee will not be too frequent and any expenses involved such as travel or otherwise would have to be assumed by your organization. I would appreciate an immediate reply from you indicating your willingness to accept this appointment.

May I reiterate that I will recommend you and the VPI officials will make the official appointment.

Sincerely and fraternally,

Labor Education Newsletter

An Extension Service of the College of Business

LABOR EDUCATION COMES TO VIRGINIA

Virginia Polytechnic Institute established its Labor Education Program on July 1, 1968, with Dr. James W. Robinson as its head. The state's first university labor education program is administered and financed jointly by the College of Business and the Extension Division. It is one component of an effort to serve industry, labor, and government through the Business Extension format initiated last year.

The Labor Education Program will offer both on- and off-campus programs of instruction for organized labor through the state extension mechanism. These programs may be 6-8 weeks "short-courses" that meet one night per week in various communities, campus conferences, or weekend institutes. The sponsoring local union, central body, or international union will determine subjects in cooperation with the program staff. Dr. Robinson will provide a liason between organized labor and the Virginia Tech faculty.

James W. Robinson

There will be no effort to duplicate existing union educational efforts. Cooperative programs, in which university and union resources are complementary, will be sought. An advisory committee of union officers and staff has been appointed to assist the Labor Education Program in meeting the educational needs of Virginia labor. Its membership will be announced in the next issue of the Newsletter.

A native of Delaware, Professor Robinson was educated at Johns Hopkins University and Duke University, having attended the former through a scholarship from the Delaware AFL-CIO.

Dr. Robinson headed the University of Missouri labor education program, 1963-66, and was associate professor of economics at the University of South Carolina last year. He is a former president of the University Labor Education Association and is a member of the executive board of American Federation of Teachers Local 189. He holds the rank of associate professor of industrial relations at Virginia Tech.

TRI-STATE LABOR SCHOOL

The Tri-State Labor School, a cooperative effort of the North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia State AFL-CIO's and the AFL-CIO, was held in the Donaldson Brown Continuing Education Center on the Virginia Tech campus, July 28-August 2. Over 100 delegates from the three states comprised the largest enrollment in Tri-State history. Faculty coordinator for the school was Dr. Roger Walker, Professor of Industrial Relations at Virginia Tech.

The program consisted of morning sessions on "Labor History" (Walker), "Economics" (Robinson), and "National Legislative Issues" (George Guernsey, AFL-CIO Assistant Director of Education). Delegates selected an afternoon workshop session also. Workshops were taught by E. T. Kehrer (AFL-CIO regional civil rights director), Wilbur Hobbie (COPE regional director), Stephen L. Cook (Director, Union Leadership Academy, West Virginia University), Robinson and Walker, and Guernsey.

Three evening programs were devoted to films, "right-to-work" legislation,

Tri-State School president W. M. Barbee presents certificate to a enthusiastic delegate

Tri-State School treasurer E. T. Kirkland presents certificate to delegate as Virginia State AFL-CIO president Julian Carper offers congratulations and "Labor's Role in the 'War on Poverty' ". Frank Emig of the AFL-CIO Legislative Affairs Department spoke on "right-to-work" legislation; and Cook moderated a panel on the OEO topic that consisted on Roger Banguss, Cecil Gowan and Homer Aleshire, all AFL-CIO regional representatives on various aspects of OEO.

The program ended with presentation of certificates to the delegates by W. M. Barbee, President of the North Carolina AFL-CIO and of the Tri-State Labor School; E. T. Kirkland, Tri-State Treasurer and Secretary-Treasurer of the South Carolina Labor Council, AFL-CIO; and Julian Carper, President of the Virginia State AFL-CIO.

UPPER SOUTH CONFERENCE

The Labor Education Program joined the Upper South Region of the Textile Workers Union of America, AFL-CIO, in sponsoring the annual Upper South Conference at the Hotel Roanoke, September 6-8. Delegates from TWUA locals in Maryland, Virginia, and West Virginia attended the conference. Upper South director, Wayne Dernoncourt, planned and directed the conference.

Dr. Robinson taught a workshop on grievance procedure; and Dr. Walker, one on labor history. Additional workshops on various topics were offered by Dernoncourt; TWUA education director Steve Remsen; TWUA COPE director William DuChessi; and TWUA organizing director

Robinson addresses NUEA delegates as other members of panel listen

Paul Swaity and John Weiser of the TWUA Research Department. TWUA General Secretary-Treasurer Saul Soulstetin spoke at the orientation session, and TWUA President William Pollack spoke at a banquet session.

Further details on this conference will appear in the next issue of the Newsletter.

NUEA CONVENTION

Professor Robinson spoke on the structure of labor education within universities as part of a panel at the convention of the National University Extension Association in Miami Beach on July 22. This session inaugurated a new section on education for industry and labor in the NUEA. Dr. Herbert Levine of Rutgers University spoke on the involvement of universities in labor education; and Jack Sessions of the AFL-CIO Education Department, on the role of organized labor in university labor education.

EDUCATION COMMITTEE MEMOS

A wealth of materials exists for use in your steward training programs, which makes an addition to the list sometimes less than exciting. However, a book that appeared first in 1966 is worth your investigation. Talks With Stewards by Terrence Connors of the Indiana University labor program is based upon the author's experience in factories and in teaching union members in a university program and attempts to help the steward understand the men he represents. The text describes 40 typical problems and offers the author's advice about solving them. The book is available in paperback form for one dollar from Professor Connors, 201 Owen Hall, Indiana University, Bloomington.

A topic of very current interest to unions is their role in the War on Poverty. One of the finest guides on this subject appeared recently from the OEO-Trade Union Leadership Training Program for New England held at the University of Massachusetts through its Labor Relations and Research Center. The Time is Now: A Guide for Trade Union Leaders Work in the War on Poverty is an 8-page "how to do it" guide with sections on How to Get Started, How to Develop a Plan for Action, and How You Can Get Union Members to Help. This booklet is very definitely recommended reading.

If you are interested in a rather complete listing of books on labor and collective bargaining, we suggest that you get a copy of Labor: A Reading List from the Joint Committee on Library Service to Labor Groups, American Library Association, 50 East Huron Street in Chicago. Then you might see whether your public and school libraries have these books.

Dear Jim:

It was a real pleasure to hear earlier this fall that you were heading the Labor Education Program at VPI. As you know, it will be the first full-time program in the old south. It is much needed and there are many of us who wish you well.

Please be sure to let me know if there is anyway in which I, or my program here at the Southern Regional Council, can be of service to you. I will be happy to do what I can.

INTRODUCTION

The existence of a complex variety of administrative structures for university labor education programs is obvious to even the casual observer of the field. However, our discussion today will include structural alternatives that involve, in some way, extension divisions only. Apart from the obvious fact that our audience is composed of extension personnel, there are two other reasons that contribute to our exclusion of consideration of non-extension programs. First, consideration of travel expenditures and the consequent audience that can be reached by a program make non-extension structures impractical in all but the metropolitan area colleges.[1] Second, and somewhat related, the extension approach provides an existing statewide mechanism.

We will consider some of the advantages and disadvantages of the four types of extension-related structures that predominate in university labor education today: the program wholly within extension, the extension division/labor education center approach, the extension division/industrial relations center approach, and the extension division/college of business approach. We will provide some estimate of the number of universities employing each of these structures also. Finally, our discussion is limited to the alternative administrative and financial structures. We are not concerned with the equally provocative topic of varying alternatives for staff appointments; i.e., a staff member might hold an academic appointment in the college of business while participating in a labor education program administered wholly within the extension division.

THE ALTERNATIVE STRUCTURES

EXTENSION DIVISION ONLY

This alternative represents a labor education program contained entirely within

1. One need look only at the Chicago and Washington, D. C. metropolitan areas to find outstanding labor education programs at Roosevelt and American Universities respectively, neither of which is in an extension framework.

the extension division. Its staff would consist of extension "specialists" in labor education, operating in much the same manner as, for example, a specialist in horticulture or 4-H work. Although no programs represent fully this structure, it possesses certain advantages. There would be complete control by the extension organization of staff appointments, salaries, and promotions, and the assurance of complete conformity with established extension procedures. The career expectations of the staff relate only to their labor education and extension performance and responsibilities. Perhaps the greatest advantage of this structure would be the presumed ability to employ talented labor education specialists who may lack one or more academic requirements (i.e., terminal degree) for appointment to a regular academic department that might be required under the other alternatives.

There are at least three disadvantages that have been sufficiently important apparently to discourage this structure. Staff recruitment can be difficult. A prospective staff member may be unwilling to relinquish the "prestige" of an appointment to the resident faculty.[2] Contact with the resident faculty, whose special talents are likely to be required for certain programs, is limited when the labor educators do not hold resident appointments. Daily contacts on both a formal and informal basis between labor educators and resident faculty facilitate the attraction of resident faculty into ad hoc instructor roles for the labor education activities. Finally, it must be recognized that extension has (hopefully a decreasing) a negative connotation sometimes to trade union (or even industry) leaders who associate it with agriculture only.

EXTENSION DIVISION + LABOR CENTER

Our discussion of this alternative refers to the situation in which a labor education center with certain administrative autonomy exists within the overall context of the extension division. Six labor education program structures of this type exist today, the most prominent of which is probably the one at

2. The labor educator who seeks an academic appointment must, of course, be willing to accept the additional responsibilities of it, such as scholarly publication.

Rutgers University. There are several advantages to the concept of a "center" that is recognized as a semi-autonomous unit within extension. First, it clearly defines and emphasizes the unique role and the importance of labor education vis a vis other extension activities. This role definition is important in terms both of the internal university "power structure" and the clientele group. Second, this concept may assist in recruiting by providing the potential staff member with an identification within extension. Third, and related to the second one, the center can build group identity among the staff, or simply esprit de corps. Fourth, the center provides a specific entity to which grants may be made and for which advisory committees may be appointed. Finally, the concept might enhance the research function and foster campus support,

The only disadvantage might be, but by no means will necessarily be, a fragmentation of extension identity and the allegiance of the staff through the increased prestige of the center.

EXTENSION + INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS CENTER

Determination of the exact number of universities with this labor education structure is difficult because of the diversity of arrangements concerning industrial relations centers. For our discussion, we refer to those industrial relations centers that are autonomous components of the university. Using these definitions, there are two universities that offer a labor education program through a cooperative arrangement between an industrial relations center and an extension division.

There are several inherent advantages to this structure. It facilitates joint extension-resident faculty appointments in which the extension and resident functions and responsibilities are complementary instead of competing. In other words, the teaching and research emphases of on- and off-campus work are likely to be similar.

Due to the special instructional demands of an industrial relations center, this structure may permit or facilitate academic appointments for former practitioners, such as former union education staff personnel. The attraction of ad hoc labor education instructors from the resident faculty should be easier because of the complementarity mentioned above. Also the promotion of labor education goals may be easier because of the interest of the resident faculty.

The primary disadvantage of this structure is the possible danger of the program's becoming too narrowly centered on the topic of collective bargaining and related fields to the exclusion of the social sciences. This disadvantage should be of decreasing importance as industrial relations centers broaden their horizons. The cost of recruiting and retaining qualified staff may be higher with this structure because of the lucrative non-university employment opportunities available in industrial relations.

EXTENSION + COLLEGE OF BUSINESS

There are three labor education programs administered jointly by the extension division and the college of business. This structure facilitates the appointment of staff with a wider range of interests than the alternatives. Staff recruitment may be easier because the offer of a joint appointment (including academic status) is possible for the wider range of interests. The scope and variety of contacts between labor educators and potential ad hoc instructors from the resident faculty are enlarged. An indirect advantage may be the broadening of the orientation of some business faculty members with respect to labor problems.

There are two significant disadvantages to this structure. First, appointment of full-time labor education staff to supplement those on joint appointments may be difficult or impossible because of formal academic requirements, thus precluding the possible recruitment of former practitioners. Second, it requires an almost Solomon-like clarification and understanding of the relative roles of labor educators by the administrators of the extension division and the college of business in determining salary and promotion policies.

SOME MISCELLANEOUS OBSERVATIONS

Several factors must be considered by university administrators contemplating the inauguration of a labor education program, regardless of the structure selected. It must be understood and recognized clearly that the amount and type of travel that the labor educator must do will far exceed that of resident faculty, and may include a relatively larger proportion out-of-state.

There must be an appreciation of the different sets of pressures on time and energy of faculty on joint appointments. The various activities of publishing, committee membership, student advising, and classroom teaching have different importance for the joint appointee.

Finally, the extension administration particularly must be prepared to adjust to a different set of demands and procedures that are necessary for dealing with organized labor. They should not expect to fit this clientele group into the procedural "mold" of others.

The Labor Education Program will reproduce on an irregular and informal basis the texts of addresses or lectures given by persons associated with this program. Alternative Structures for University Labor Education, the second address reprinted in this manner, was presented originally in Miami Beach, Florida at the 1968 annual convention of the National University Extension Association as part of a panel on labor education.

SUMMARY

The Laborers' International Union, AFL-CIO, sponsored a Staff Training Institute on the Virginia Polytechnic Institute campus, February 24-28, in cooperation with the Labor Education Program. All sessions were held in the Donaldson Brown Continuing Education Center in which the participants were housed also. Twenty delegates from Laborers' local unions in Maryland, West Virginia, Virginia, North Carolina, and the District of Columbia attended the institute. Their official responsibilities ranged from part-time local office to full-time international staff positions. Tenure in office was distributed equally broadly.

All of the staff involved in this program were impressed by the interest and the dedication evidenced by the participants. They went about their studies with a single-minded effort and enjoyed fellowship with one another that transcended regional, age, or other differences.

LABORERS' STAFF TRAINING INSTITUTE

The Laborers' International Union of North America, AFL-CIO, sponsored a regional Staff Training Institute on the Virginia Tech campus, February 24-28. Twenty delegates from local unions and district councils in Maryland, Virginia, the District of Columbia, West Virginia, and North Carolina attended the institute held in the Donaldson Brown Continuing Education Center. Program instructors were Tommy Calloway, LIUNA Representative; Frank Caputo, Bureau of Labor-Management and Welfare-Pension Reports; Robert Myers, LIUNA Representative; James Owen, Assistant Professor of English; J. D. Richardson, Coordinator of Business Extension; James Robinson, Head of the Labor Education Program; Arthur Schiller, Associate General Counsel, LIUNA; Roger Walker, Professor of Industrial Relations; and Jack Wilkinson, LIUNA Regional Manager.

Class sessions included Union Administration (Wilkinson, Myers, Calloway), Communications and Public Speaking (Owen and Richardson), The Economy of the U. S. (Robinson), NLRB Procedures (Schiller), Reporting Procedures (Caputo), and Labor History (Walker). One of the highlights of the program was the use of video tape facilities in the public speaking sessions. Each delegate had an opportunity to view his speaking performance on closed-circuit television tape replay.

The program concluded with a graduation luncheon. Delegates received a certificate from Dr. Maynard Heckel, Associate Dean of Extension and Director of the Continuing Education Center. Dr. Heckel; Roger Comley, Director of Center Operations; and Jack Wilkinson spoke at the luncheon.

TWUA UPPER SOUTH CONFERENCE

Over 100 delegates from Virginia, Maryland, and West Virginia locals attended the annual Upper South Conference of the Textile Workers Union of America, AFL-CIO, at the Hotel Roanoke on September 6-8. The program was co-sponsored by the TWUA Upper South Region and the Labor Education Program. Instructors at the Conference included Professors James Robinson and Roger Walker of the Virginia Tech College of Business; Wayne Dernoncourt, Upper South Director; William DuChessi, TWUA Legislative Director; Steve Remsen, TWUA Education Director; Paul Swaity, TWUA Organizing Director; and John Weiser of the TWUA Research Department.

There were workshops on Grievance Procedure (Robinson), Arbitration (Remsen), Work Assignments (Weiser), Organization (Swaity), and Labor History (Walker). Mr. DuChessi addressed the group on, "Election Year, 1968." TWUA General Secretary-Treasurer Saul Stetin spoke at a banquet on the evening of September 7. The delegates completed an evaluation of the conference and voted to hold another conference next year at the concluding session on September 8.

SUMMER PROGRAMS

There will be a full summer calender for the Labor Education Program with several international unions planning residential schools to be held in the Donaldson Brown Continuing Education Center. The American Federation of Government Employees will sponsor a week-long institute for its District 2 members, June 9-13. Among the subjects will be Meaning of Collective Bargaining, Contract Clauses, The Coordinated Federal Wage System, and Labor History. In addition to the AFGE instructors, Professors Robinson and Walker of Virginia Tech, and Jerald F. Robinson of the University of Illinois will participate.

The United Steelworkers of America will hold its Districts 35/36 summer school on the campus, June 23-27. Some 250 delegates from Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama are expected to attend. Some of the subjects to be offered are Unions and the Community, Labor History, Grievance Procedures, Effective Union Meetings, Unions and Politics, and Foreign Affairs. Professors Robinson, Walker, Edwin Marsh, and A. Coskun Samli of the Virginia Tech College of Business will be joined as instructors by Jerald Robinson of the University of Illinois, Ephraim Fischoff of Lynchburg College, and Stephen Cook of West Virginia University.

The Tri-State Labor School will be on the campus, August 17-22. The Tri-State School is sponsored annually by the North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia State AFL-CIO's. Over 100 persons from the three states are expected to attend.

ROBINSON AND WALKER SPEAK

Dr. Roger W. Walker of the College of Business addressed the 11th annual convention of the North Carolina State AFL-CIO in Asheville, on September 5. The topic of his address was, "The American Labor Movement - Past and Future." It included a commentary on the definition of a labor movement, past and present violence, the need to re-win rights, inability to be neutral, and political action.

Dr. James Robinson addressed the annual convention of the South Carolina Labor Council, AFL-CIO, in Myrtle Beach on September 6. His address stressed the importance of beginning labor education programs in the South, means of starting programs, and the need for local education programs.

North Carolina AFL-CIO President W. M. Barbee chats with Professor Walker before his address to the convention

EDUCATION COMMITTEE MEMO

Local officers know the need to acquaint younger members with the past struggles in order to convey an appreciation of current accomplishments. Several excellent films on labor history are available; and union, government, and private sources offer various brochures and pamphlets. However, one exceptional resource is a 32-page book entitled Our Union Heritage by William Abbott, education director of the United Rubber Workers who published it. Mr. Abbott traces the development of organized labor and writes with a lively and easy style with numerous antecdotes and examples. Photographs and drawings are employed amply. This very readable book is available from the URW for twenty-five cents.

Dear Mr. Via:

The College of Business and the Extension Division of Virginia Polytechnic Institute, with the cooperation of labor leaders in Virginia, have established a Labor Education Program at VPI. This program is a component of the total Business Extension activity which also has separate programs for business and public administrators.

We are establishing advisory groups to work with the Business Extension activity and with each of the program areas. The Business Extension Advisory Committee will provide advice and assistance in the development of the overall program in the College of Business. A sub-committee will be formed for each of the three program areas to aid in the development of a quality program that meets the specific needs of the group. This aid may be in the form of program development, laison with the membership, establishment of priorities, etc. Committee members will be selected from the sub-committees in order to provide exchange and continuity.

It is my pleasure to invite you to serve on the Labor Education Program Advisory Sub-Committee for the College of Business of Virginia Polytechnic Institute. We feel that you can make an important contribution to the vitality of this program and hope that you can accept this appointment.

As soon as the composition of the committee is determined, Dr. James Robinson, the Coordinator of our Labor Education Progam, will convene a meeting and notify you.

Most sincerely,

INTRODUCTION

On July 1, 1968, Virginia Polytechnic Institute became the 30th university in America with a full-time Labor Education Program, and the first one in the South. The purposes of labor education have been defined by two experts in the discipline as:

> 1. To equip workers as trade union members and officers to carry out intelligently the collective bargaining functions of their unions; to function efficiently in the area of internal union organization and administration;
> 2. To narrow the gap between the formal education of workers and other groups in society with which they must deal, by helping workers to understand the economy and the society in which they play a vital role, and the social forces operating in the world of today;
> 3. To equip workers to take a more active and responsible role in all civic affairs as individuals, and as representatives of their trade unions in order to maintain and expand the democratic processes of government.
> Alice H. Cook and Agnes M. Douty, Labor Education Outside the Unions.

As a distinct field of adult education, labor education has a long and colorful history, dating from the first elemental efforts of conscientious citizens to acquaint immigrant workers with their new homeland. In the 1920's and early 1930's, the University of California, the University of Wisconsin, and Rutgers University established labor education programs. A workers' education project within the WPA provided further stimulus during the Depression. A Labor Extension Service existed within the U. S. Department of Labor for several years during the 1940's. Today virtually all international unions have education departments that cooperate with universities to provide labor education services.

The University Labor Education Association unites all universities with full-time programs today. Local 189 of the American Federation of Teachers includes most labor educators in its world-wide membership. Pennsylvania State University and Rutgers University offer degree programs for labor educators. The Union Leadership Academy program unites seven universities in a cooperative program of coordinated education.

Most labor education activities fall into one of two categories: residential programs in which union members and officials come to the campus for a period of a week or more of intensive instruction, or non-residential "short courses" offered in various cities throughout the state usually one evening per week. Topics included are quite varied, ranging from the basics of leadership and union administration to in-depth study of current economic, political, and social affairs.

Latest statistics indicate that there are 199 thousand union members in Virginia, of whom 136 thousand are members of unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO. This total ranks 22nd among the states, and 40th as a percentage of the labor force organized. What follows is a description of the ways in which the Labor Education Program has sought to serve these members.

I. Programs Presented, Fiscal 1968 - 69

In its first year of operation, the Labor Education Program offered conferences or schools for 4 international unions and 3 state labor organizations. Seven faculty members from Virginia Polytechnic Institute participated in these programs along with faculty members of three other universities. The following table presents a summary of these activities.

	Numbers of Delegates Registered for Program	Contact Hours by VPI Faculty	Contact Hours by Other Faculty
On-Campus Programs	338	75	65
Off-Campus Programs	155	20	30
Total	493	95	95

An overwhelming majority of the delegates to these programs were residents of Virginia. However, members of local unions in Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, and West Virginia were included in the programs. This latter result occurs because all but one of the programs offered were of a regional character. This circumstance is natural because of the general absence of labor education programs in the South and the regional nature of union schools and conferences.

Summaries of the programs offered are presented on the next three pages.

VIRGINIA TECH

CAMPUS GUIDE

Virginia's Land-Grant University

Historical Sketch

Virginia Polytechnic Institute was established in 1872 as the Virginia Agricultural and Mechanical College after a prolonged fight had been waged in the Virginia General Assembly by various colleges to get a share of the land scrip provided by Congress through the Morrill Land-Grant Act of 1862.

In March 1872, the General Assembly voted to accept an offer of $20,000 from Montgomery County and the one building of the Preston and Olin Institute in Blacksburg and locate the land-grant college there.

The new college opened its doors on October 1, 1872, with a president, two faculty members, a librarian, and 43 students. In less than 70 years it would become the largest university in the state.

The first 20 years of the new college's life were filled with difficulties, confusion, and struggles, mostly caused by political interference, the case at most land-grant colleges in those early days following the Civil War.

During the administration of Dr. John M. McBryde, the college's fifth president (1891-1907), the institution began its great growth. It was during McBryde's administration that the words "Polytechnic Institute" were added to the name. At that time (1896), the college became popularly known as Virginia Tech. In 1944, the "Agricultural and Mechanical College" was dropped and the legal name became Virginia Polytechnic Institute. At the same time, Radford College became Tech's women's division; the two were separated in 1964.

Since its founding, Virginia Tech has been served by 11 presidents. Its current president, Dr. T. Marshall Hahn Jr., assumed the presidency on July 1, 1962, at age 35, the youngest president in the university's history.

Instruction, Research, and Extension

Today, Virginia Tech is more than a university, as it serves the state, the nation, and the world in the three important fields of instruction, research, and extension.

Bachelor's degrees are offered in six academic colleges on the undergraduate level: Agriculture, Architecture, Arts and Sciences, Business, Engineering, and Home Economics. Graduate work is offered in 56 fields of study on the master's level and in 28 leading to the doctorate.

The university is accredited by the Southern Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools and ranks second in the nation in the number of engineering curricula accredited by the Engineering Council for Professional Development.

Tech's Research Division is responsible for fostering the growth and enhancement of the research activities of the university by providing a wide range of administrative and technical services to assist the faculty in obtaining research support and successfully carrying out their research programs.

Extension, the "off-campus" education arm of the university, has been a part of Tech since early in the century. The Division conducts educational programs throughout the state in the areas of agriculture, community development, 4-H, general academics, home economics, resource development, and technical services.

Adult education is another phase of work conducted by the university on a broad scope. The new Continuing Education Center provides the on-campus physical facilities for field days, conferences, and short courses which offer an economical means of providing refresher material and latest information to the public on a year-round basis.

Location

Virginia Tech is located in Montgomery County in beautiful Southwest Virginia, adjoining the town of Blacksburg. The campus lies on a plateau between the Blue Ridge and Allegheny Mountains 2,100 feet above sea level. The area is noted for its natural beauty, healthy atmosphere, and outdoor recreational opportunities.

The campus is 40 miles west of Roanoke, the commercial hub of the area, easily reached via four-lane highways (U. S. 460 and Interstate 81). Air service is provided through Roanoke (Eastern and Piedmont) and New River Valley Airport at Dublin (Piedmont). The university operates a landing field for private airplanes about a mile south of the central campus. The area also is served by the main line of the Norfolk and Western Railway. Direct bus service to Blacksburg is available through Trailways.

Campus and Facilities

The Virginia Tech campus covers about 2,300 acres and includes the Tech Airport, university farm, experimental plats, and orchards. The university also has about 600 acres of adjoining farm land under long-term lease and owns about 1,300 nearby acres and mineral rights to about 1,300 other acres.

The physical plant includes 85 principal buildings and numerous less important structures. Among the more notable facilities are Burruss Hall, the administration building and 3,003-seat auditorium; the Tech Coliseum, seating up to 10,000 (the largest auditorium in the state); Lane Stadium which seats 35,000; the VPI Memorial and Chapel (containing eight sculptured pylons, a granite cenotaph, a magnificent pipe organ and chancel sculpture, and the names of Tech's war dead); the Donaldson Brown Center for Continuing Education (with overnight accommodations for 262); Squires Student Center; and the Carol M. Newman Library (with more than half a million volumes).

Potpourri

Tech is an independent member of the National Collegiate Athletic Association and participates in football, basketball, baseball, cross country, track and field, wrestling, tennis, golf, and swimming on the varsity and freshmen levels. Non-varsity participation is in soccer and lacrosse. Team colors are Chicago maroon and burnt orange; nicknames include "Gobblers" and "Hokies."

Southwest Va.

Recreational and tourist attractions abound in the area.

Tech's nine-hole golf course is open to campus visitors.

Boating, swimming, camping, and fishing facilities are available at nearby Claytor Lake State Park. The surrounding area is a hunting paradise. Also located nearby are famous Mountain Lake, the Blue Ridge Parkway, Roanoke and Shenandoah Valleys, and Jefferson National Forest.

Within a two-hour drive of the campus are world-famous Natural Bridge; historic Lexington and Appomattox; Abingdon and the Barter Theater; Hungry Mother and Douthat State Parks; Peaks of Otter; Staunton, birthplace of Woodrow Wilson; and many other scenic and historic points of interest.

Smithfield Plantation, a restored 1772 colonial house, is open to the public Wednesdays through Sundays from 1-4 p.m. ($1 admission for adults; children under 12 with parents, free). Two governors of Virginia and many of their descendants are buried on the Plantation. Entrance is from the Tech campus west of the President's Home.

The Donaldson Brown Continuing Education Center, on the campus of Virginia Polytechnic Institute, is dedicated to provide an atmosphere and the staff competence wherein the extension, teaching and research capabilities of the university can be focused on the problems faced by citizens in our dynamic society. The Center was made possible through state appropriations and private gifts of alumni and friends of VPI.

Educational leadership will be provided in a residential setting to assure the best possible use of resources in identifying educational needs, designing effective educational programs and assisting with the evaluation of such endeavors. This leadership will be provided by VPI faculty whose special competences will assure that activities are directed toward significant educational purposes. The faculty will be drawn from each of the six colleges of the university.

Appropriate conferences, institutes, workshops, seminars and other types of intensive educational programs will be conducted in the Center to achieve the stated purposes. The opportunity to learn and live together will make these activities particularly meaningful.

The specific objectives of the Continuing Education Center are:

To translate research findings and relate them to practical problems of local, state, national and international importance.

To further the philosophy of the land grant educational system by fostering the application of university resources to the needs of our citizens.

To inform leaders and policy makers of the relevance of university extension, research and teaching to local, state, national and international problems and needs.

To provide modern facilities for meetings of groups or organizations in business, industry, community service, family life, agriculture, government, the arts or the professions which are seeking university assistance in developing educational programs within the setting of Virginia's Land Grant University.

To provide practical educational experiences for prospective adult educators interested in increasing their knowledge of the processes by which continuing education programs are effectively planned and conducted.

To provide an example for the total student body of the role and importance of continuing education.

To relate to and complement all programs of continuing education of the University.

Extension Division/Virginia Polytechnic Institute/Blacksburg, Virginia

The Donaldson Brown Continuing Education Center

A sound program of education is not a piece of carpentry to be put together in a few days; it is like a tree which must be allowed to grow and mature—the simple but powerful ideal of life-long learning for all men.

Facilities Designed Exclusively for the Best in Communication and Comfort

The Continuing Education Center building is planned to be an ideal setting for adult learning. There are complete facilities for conducting sessions for groups as large as 600 . . . an auditorium, meeting rooms of all sizes, complete line of audio-visual equipment including video tape capability, library and exhibit areas.

In addition, the Center provides complete living accommodations for 264 guests, along with large and small dining rooms, a coffee shop . . . providing all the necessary conference facilities in one convenient location.

The initial request for an educational program at the Center may come from a variety of sources. In view of the purpose and objectives of the Center, requests will ordinarily be entertained from one of the following:

- A college, division, department or faculty member of the university.
- A scholarly or professional association which has among its membership staff persons of the university.
- A group, organization or individual which is seeking university assistance in developing effective continuing educational programs.
- The program staff of the Center.

Dear Emory:

You have recently received a notice from Dr. Jim Robinson concerning the first meeting of the Labor Advisory Committee. The meeting is scheduled for 10:30 A.M., Monday, September 15, at VPI, Blacksburg, Virginia.

Since this is our initial meeting and the future effectiveness, as well as the nature of the Labor Education Program of the Institution could well be determined by the type of leadership the Advisory Committee may be able to offer, it is imperative that we share your presence.

I look forward with pleasure to seeing you at the meeting. Also, I trust this may be the beginning of a new and effective labor education program for the Virginia trade union movement.

Otto Pragan, Assistant Director of the AFL-CIO Department of Education taught sessions on the Meaning of Collective Bargaining, Urban Problems, and Negotiations. AFGE Education Director Arthur Kane taught a session on AFGE Structure and Functions; and Assistant Education Director Raymond Gray, on the Coordinated Federal Wage System and Running the Local Meeting.

Jerald Robinson of the University of Illinois taught classes on Contract Administration; James Robinson of Virginia Tech taught the Legislative Sessions; and Roger Walker of Virginia Tech taught sessions on Telling the Union Story: Internal and External Communications. James Robinson moderated an evening panel session on "What's Ahead for Public Employee Unionism." Panel members were Kane, Pragan, and Jerald Robinson.

ABEL ADDRESSES USWA SCHOOL

President I. W. Abel of the United Steelworkers of America addressed delegates to the annual Summer Institute of the USWA held this year in the Donaldson Brown Center for Continuing Education on the Virginia Tech campus, June 25-27. President Abel stressed the great need for education in organized labor and noted, with respect to labor history, that, "Those who do not study the past often relive it."

Some 160 delegates from locals in Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia attended the 3-day institute sponsored by USWA Districts 35 and 36. General sessions included National Legislative Issues (John Sheehan, USWA Legislative Director), Unions and the Community (Professor Ephraim Fischoff, Lynchburg College), Perspectives on Labor History (Professor Roger Walker, Virginia Tech), A Look Behind the Iron Curtain (Professor A. Coskun Samli, Virginia Tech), Unionizing the Organized (Jerald Robinson, University of Illinois), and Unions and Politics (Wayne Dernoncourt, TWUA Vice-President).

The delegates were divided into smaller groups for education on Grievance Procedures and Effective Union Meetings taught by Professors James Robinson and M. Murphy Bird of Virginia Tech, and Jerald Robinson and Roger Walker. Professor Edwin Marsh delivered the banquet address on the final evening of the conference.

TRI-STATE SCHOOL RETURNS

The 1969 Tri-State Labor School was held in the Donaldson Brown Center for Continuing Education on the campus of Virginia Tech, August 17-22. The annual summer school is sponsored by the North Carolina AFL-CIO; South Carolina Labor Council, AFL-CIO; the Virginia State AFL-CIO; the AFL-CIO Department of Education; and the Labor Education Program of Virginia Tech. There were 43 delegates from North Carolina, 25 from South Carolina, and 27 from Virginia, representing locals of 20 different international unions.

The faculty for the school consisted of Stuart Brock, Clinton Fair, E. T. Kehrer, James O'Brian, and Dan Powell for various AFL-CIO departments; Pat Eames, Wayne Dernoncourt, and Stephen Remsen from the TWUA; Leonard Dudley of the North Carolina AFL-CIO; Robert Esposito, the AFT Local 189 intern; and John D. Richardson and James Robinson from Virginia Tech; and William Clithroe of the IAM.

IAM Grand Lodge Representative William Clithroe shows delegates how to run a good union meeting

AFL-CIO Assistant Director of Education, Stuart Brock discusses the New South with delegates

Each delegate in the Basic Program (first year) received instruction on Social Security and Income Maintenance (O'Brian and Powell), Labor History (Robinson), and The Changing South (Brock) each morning. The afternoons were divided into five workshops from which each delegate selected one: Organization (Brock), Running Union Meetings (Clithroe), COPE (Powell and Dernoncourt), Shop Steward Training (Remsen), and Communications and Public Relations (Dudley and Richardson). Delegates in the Communications workshop produced a newspaper on the Tri-State School, and those in the COPE workshop received practical experience related to the Virginia primary election.

Students who had attended a previous school were in the Advanced Group which met all day with Pat Eames and Kehrer to discuss various current topics in depth. All delegates came together for evening sessions that included Hunger in America, Southern Politics: A New Coalition, and Revitalizing State Government.

Mrs. Frances Lowe receives certificate at graduation luncheon from (l to r) Julian Carper, W. M. Barbee, and E. T. Kirkland

At the graduation luncheon, delegates received certificates from President W. M. Barbee of the North Carolina AFL-CIO, Secretary-Treasurer E. T. Kirkland of the South Carolina Labor Council, and President Julian F. Carper of the Virginia State AFL-CIO.

ANNUAL REPORT

The first annual report of the Labor Education Program was issued in July. In its first year of operation, the Labor Education Program co-sponsored schools or conferences for 4 international unions and 3 state labor organizations. A total of 493 delegates received 95 hours of instruction from Virginia Tech faculty and 95 hours from other persons. Copies of the Annual Report are available free of charge from the Labor Education Program.

Also available free are Labor Education in Virginia which describes the Program and copies of the evaluations of the TWUA Upper South Program, 1968 Tri-State Labor School, and the Staff Training Institute of the Laborers International Union; copies of Roger Walker's address to the 1968 convention of the North Carolina AFL-CIO; and copies Professor Robinson's address at the 1968 convention of the National University Extension Association.

WALKER DEPARTS

Persons who have attended various schools and conferences co-sponsored by the Labor Education Program are familiar with Dr. Roger W. Walker whose contributions of time and energy were a major factor in getting the new program started. Dr. Walker resigned in July to accept an endowed chair as Professor of Economics at Hamline University in St. Paul, Minnesota. His wit and flowing delivery will be missed by all in Virginia organized labor who were privileged to hear him. We all wish him well.

NEW ADDRESS

The Labor Education Program has a new address due to a switch in offices and a new name for the building which houses the College of Business. Correspondence should be addressed to 115 Pamplin Hall. The telephone number will be 552-6465, area code 703.

EDUCATION COMMITTEE MEMO

An individual often misunderstood in the community is the union organizer. Roosevelt University's Labor Education Division has reprinted an article that appeared in the Chicago Sun Times' Midwest Magazine entitled simply, "The Union Organizer." Reporter Fred Frailey presents an objective and understanding portrait of organizer Harry Kurshenbaum who is also with the Labor Education Division at Roosevelt. The article was prepared for the general public and makes interesting and informative reading. If you are interested in obtaining copies for distribution, contact Labor Education Division, Roosevelt University, Chicago, Illinois for details and information.

Dear Sir:

The Advisory Subcommittee on Labor Education met at the Donaldson Brown Center for Continuing Education on September 15, with all but two of the members present.

After the election of a chairman, vice chairman and secretary for the group, a frank and energetic discussion followed as to the functions of the subcommittee, the status of the labor education program in the College of Business, the role it should occupy in relation to the labor movement, and its potential standing as a vital part of the educational responsibilities of VPI.

Although the staff of the College of Business have contributed generously to our understanding of the services that can be provided in a labor education program, there are several unanswered questions that our committee believe it advisable to discuss with you or such other authorities as you might consider proper. Accordingly, it will be appreciated if you will agree to meet with a group of not more than six or seven of our committee members for that purpose. We would like to suggest the morning of Friday, October 17, if possible.

You may be interested to know that our committee unanimously directed that the minutes of the meeting include an expression of commendation to the College of Business and to the authorities of VPI for being the leader among institutions of higher learning in Virginia in establishing a labor education program, and expressing our gratitude for it.

Sincerely,

I hope you will excuse me for the delay in answering your kind letter of October 13, but we have been in the process of moving our headquarters and everything has been somewhat confused as a result.

In the discussion with Dean Heckel, I asked him if he would inform you that the proposed meeting with you on October 17 would best be delayed until a more opportune time, and he agreed to do so. Consequently, my inability to answer your letter prior to that date, I sincerely hope, did not result in any inconvenience to you.

It is still our desire to meet with you whenever you can find time to do so and we can assemble our subcommittee. If you can name a date sometime after November 22, preferably on a Friday, we will try to accommodate to your convenience. I shall be pleased to hear from you as to your wishes. Fraternal Greetings:

In compliance with the directive of the Committee, as adopted on September 15 at the Blacksburg meeting, I have endeavored to arrange a meeting of our subcommittee with Doctor Malpass, Vice President for Academic Affairs. Due to the heavy commitments of everyone involved, such a meeting could not be scheduled easily; however, it has now been done.

Doctor Malpass and other selected VPI staff personnel will meet with our subcommittee at the Continuing Education Center, in Blacksburg, at 11 A. M., on Friday, December 19. As a reminder, members of the subcommittee are Julian F. Carper, Wayne Dernoncourt, Emory Via and Jack Wilkinson. George Guernsey is Consultant.

I regret that no alternate date for the meeting could be procured and hope that all members of the subcommittee can be present. If we can be of any help in personal arrangements, please let me know.

Subcommittee

Dear Mr. Snow:

Recently you and several members of the Labor Education Program Advisory Subcommittee met with representatives of Virginia Polytechnic Institute to present some problems experienced by the group and to discuss the possibilities of establishing an independent labor education program at VPI. We have considered the suggestions most carefully and would like now to share our thoughts with you and with your group.

First, we would like to reaffirm our belief that Virginia Polytechnic Institute as the land-grant University of Virginia has an educational and service commitment to the labor sector in the state of Virginia. This is an obligation which we early recognized by contacting you to initiate the VPI program.

Secondly, we would like to express our appreciation to the Subcommittee for their recommendations and for their obviously genuine concern for the development of an outstanding program in Virginia.

With regard to the problems of committee identification and association with an academic activity entitled business (i.e. College of Business), let me assure you that we were concerned with the association problem when first developing the program in Business Extension but felt that since labor was an essential component of business, the antipathy would not be felt in the academic relationship. The problem of subcommittee status quite frankly had not been evident to us, perhaps due to the number of successful subcommittees which we operate with in other areas, and perhaps since we have a major concern for the total Business Extension effort and the total responsibility to the three groups represented by the industry, labor, and public sectors. Within this over-all responsibility, we feel that the three components are equal and hope that we allocate our resources accordingly. Most certainly we hope that our over-all Business Extension Advisory Committee, made up of representatives from each sector as it is, shares equally in their contributions and responsibilities. Regardless of the previous views and understanding held here, it is appreciated that the views you expressed contain real concerns, concerns which organizationally are problems to you. We feel confident that much can be done to alleviate these difficulties and will work to improve the structure terminology and identification. We are searching for a new name which will more accurately reflect the broader image of Business Extension.

The organization structure initially established for Business Extension and the included Labor Education Program was developed to fit the administrative framework existing at that time and to utilize the resources which were available. The structure calls for a Director of Business Extension and the three major divisions of Industry, Labor, and Public Administration, each with a coordinator. Since the resources were and are primarily located in the College of Business, the structure seems appropriate to the present obligations. Plans for the continued growth and development of this type of extension activity include the possibility of the establishment of an Assistant or Associate Dean in the College of Business with responsibility for this area.

From the point of view that VPI initiated the Virginia Labor Education Program, one of the first in the South; that considerable resources have been allocated to the program over the two years of its existence; and that we have during these two years been rapidly developing our understanding of the group and its needs, we are satisfied that our effort has been both sincere and rewarding. At the present time, although we feel that our extension efforts are meeting with some success, it is obvious that we are having growing pains. These we are hoping to correct over time.

It is in this light that we believe it appropriate not to take steps to establish an Institute, Industrial Relations Center, or independent Labor Program at this time. It is felt that the present structure, with our expansion plans, provides the opportunity to accomplish the same purpose and within the existing administrative structure at VPI. Hopefully some improvement will be realized through the identification of more appropriate names for the existing organization structure and supporting advisory committees. Of course, this plan will be reviewed regularly to insure that we are meeting our goals effectively.

Once again, let me express my appreciation to the Subcommittee for their interest and concern with the development of the Labor Program at VPI. This type of positive advisory action will help us in the development of our mutual goals.

Most sincerely,

J. D. Richardson

INDUSTRIAL AND LABOR RELATIONS PROGRAM (703) 552-6195

October 12, 1971

Dear Union Official:

The most complex challenge facing the local union in its relationship with management is only now taking sufficient shape to be comprehended by most officials. In 1970 the Congress enacted the Occupational Safety and Health Act. The AFL-CIO has played a key role in the enactment of this landmark legislation.

In cooperation with the Virginia Department of Labor and Industry, the Industrial and Labor Relations Program at Virginia Tech has designed a two-day conference to aid all concerned parties in understanding the law, the resulting procedures, and their respective roles. It is important for ALL local unions to have the benefit of the information to be discussed at this program. Local union officers, stewards, and safety committee members should attend.

You will find enclosed a more detailed outline of the program and the speakers. I believe you will find this conference to be an enlightening experience. Come and join us on the campus for this educational program.

RESEARCH

SERVICE

INTRODUCTION

The LABOR EDUCATION PROGRAM was established at Virginia Polytechnic Institute on July 1, 1968 as a part of the Business Extension program that offers extension education to industry, labor, and government through the College of Business. The LABOR EDUCATION PROGRAM is financed and administrated by the Extension Division and the College of Business cooperatively. The overall Business Extension effort is directed by Dr. John D. Richardson; and the LABOR EDUCATION PROGRAM, by Dr. James W. Robinson.

The LABOR EDUCATION PROGRAM is designed to provide (1) educational conferences, short-courses, and institutes, both on- and off-campus, for the members of organized labor in Virginia; (2) meaningfull research on manpower issues; and (3) a liason between unions desiring assistance in their educational programs and those faculty members capable of providing such assistance. Every effort is made to avoid duplication of efforts being made by the various union education programs and to coordinate the work of the LABOR EDUCATION PROGRAM with such efforts. An advisory committee of union officers provide planning assistance and evaluation of program efforts.

The LABOR EDUCATION PROGRAM may be contacted at 28 Commerce Hall, Virginia Polytechnic Institute, Blacksburg, Virginia 24061 or by telephone at (703) 552-6589.

STARTING COURSE FOR YOUR UNION

PLANNING

Once you have decided that you are interested in a program for your union, a planning session will be held at a mutually convenient site. Members of your union and the head of the LABOR EDUCATION PROGRAM will be present. In addition, staff of the Donaldson Brown Continuing Education Center will be present for the planning of on-campus programs to evaluate the proposed program and to offer suggestions about lodging, meals, and meeting facilities of the Center. The county extension agent will be present at planning sessions for off-campus programs. Any faculty who are likely to participate in the proposed program may be present also.

The purposes of a planning session are (1) to determine the role of the university in the proposed program, (2) to formulate the content of the program, (3) to identify university resources for the program, and to determine necessary charges for instruction, materials, and facilities. The results of the planning session are submitted to Dr. Richardson and the administrations of the Extension Division and the College of Business for approval and comments.

Costs

It is difficult to offer an advance estimate of the costs for any program before a planning session. Costs depend upon the faculty employed, quantity and type of materials needed, and facilities used. As a general rule, the charge for the time of university resident (non-extension) faculty will approximate $50 per hour of instruction. Charges for instruction by extension staff, such as the head of the LABOR EDUCATION PROGRAM, depend upon travel expenses, etc., but they should be less than the above figure in all cases. Materials are provided at actual cost. Meal charges depend upon the menus selected and will vary in accordance with them.

GENERAL CRITERIA

Duration

Normally, a short-course or off-campus program would meet one night per week for two hours over a period of six to eight weeks in the community in which the union is located. Weekend institutes on specialized topics are possible also.

On-campus conferences may last from one day to a week or more. It must be emphasized that on-campus programs, particularly those of over one day in duration, require considerable advance planning so that facilities may be scheduled to meet adequately the needs of the sponsoring group.

Enrollment

Because most labor education programs will involve "non-credit" courses, there are few formal requirements for admission. In general, the union sponsoring the course will determine which of its members can benefit most from the instruction to be provided. A minimum enrollment of 20 persons is necessary usually to prevent the cost per person from becoming excessive, although there is no formal rule on this matter.

YOUR INTERNATIONAL UNION

The international union with which your local is affiliated is likely to have an education department with professional staff. These staff may be able to suggest the subject matter that they consider of greatest importance in a course. Also they may want to suggest those areas in which the university can be most helpful and those in which the international union staff can better function.

FLEXIBILITY

The most important fact to remember in planning a course is that the Virginia Tech LABOR EDUCATION PROGRAM can function only as well as it is able to meet your needs. There are no "standard" or prescribed courses. Each course for each local union or central body is designed to offer what you request and what you think meets your most pressing needs.

Some course outlines are listed on the following pages to stimulate your thinking and not as a catalog or a rigid set of requirements. Some, all, or none of them may fit your needs. If none of them do, we can develop a course to meet your needs through a planning session (see above).

We must know your needs in order to meet them satisfactorily.

HIGHLIGHTS OF WISCONSIN'S UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION LAW

A. Background

Unemployment compensation in this country dates back to the depression of the 1930's when millions suffered from unemployment. Wisconsin was the first state to pass a law calling for weekly compensation to the unemployed. Three years later Congress passed the Social Security Act of 1935 which included, among other famous provisions, a federal program to induce all remaining states to pass unemployment insurance laws. A state-by-state system of unemployment compensation laws developed, with minimum federal control. The major objectives of the unemployment compensation program are:

1. to provide a laid-off worker with adequate money benefits to tide him over until he can find work again, and
2. to help stave off nation-wide depression by keeping up purchasing power through the payment of millions of dollars of unemployment benefits.

B. Financing

Employers are required to finance the cost of state unemployment compensation programs by paying a payroll tax. In Wisconsin, this payroll tax is accumulated into separate employer reserve accounts. A worker, laid off from a particular employer, will receive benefits out of that employer's reserve account. Under Wisconsin's experience-rating system, the amount of tax an employer pays depends on the level of his reserve fund. If an employer can keep layoffs to a minimum and keep sufficient money reserves, his tax will be lowered or be nil. If an employer has many layoffs, and constantly depletes his reserve account (like AMC), that employer's tax will be at the highest rate allowed under the law. This system of raising and lowering the tax rate was devised to encourage employers to stabilize employment in order to get the advantage of a lower tax.

Q. CAN YOU SEE ANY DANGERS IN A SYSTEM THAT REWARDS EMPLOYERS WITH A LOWER TAX, WHEN THEY KEEP WITHDRAWALS TO A MINIMUM?

C. Who is eligible for unemployment benefits?

Most working men and women who are laid off from work are eligible for unemployment benefits. The amount and duration of benefits are based on a person's work and wages for each particular employer he has worked for in the previous year. However, before a person can draw benefits, he must meet the eligibility requirements listed below:

1. He must work for an employer with four or more employees.

All employers who employ four or more employees must pay into the unemployment compensation fund (with certain exceptions) and, therefore, his employees would be eligible for benefits.

Employees working for employers with three or less employees, for religious or charitable organizations, for smaller governmental units or for agricultural enterprises are not eligible.

Employees of the federal government, of the State of Wisconsin, of the City of Milwaukee and servicemen with an honorable discharge are eligible.

2. He must work 18 weeks in the previous year.

An employee must have worked in at least 18 weeks in the 52-week period immediately preceding his first claim for benefits. These 18 weeks do not have to be for one employer, they can be for 18 different employers.

3. He must average at least $16.00 per week.

A person must maintain a $16.00 average weekly wage in order to be eligible for benefits from a particular employer's account.

4. He must be physically able to work and available for work.

A person's health must be good enough to be able to do some work. He must be substantially in the job market and looking for work.

5. He must serve a waiting-period week.

A person must put in one week a year in which he meets all the eligibility requirements for unemployment compensation, but he does not get paid for that one week.

6. He must register each week at a state employment office.

A laid-off worker must register at the Wisconsin State Employment

Office (or some other state employment office) each week he expects to get unemployment compensation.

7. He must report and pick up a claim form from an unemployment compensation office.

A person filing for unemployment compensation must report and pick up a claim form from the unemployment compensation department each week. This is in addition to registering for work. Both visits are necessary.

8. He must return a claim form after each week is over.

After each week of unemployment, the person must return his unemployment compensation claim form (UC 17) to the unemployment compensation department.

Example: A person reports to an unemployment compensation office during his first week of lay-off. At that time, he picks up a claim form applying to that week. But he cannot turn it in that week because he does not know if he will end up doing any work that week. The unemployment compensation law defines a week as ending at midnight on Saturday. Since it is always possible he could work on Saturday, he cannot fill out the claim form accurately until after the close of the week. Therefore, he turns it in on his second visit to the unemployment compensation office. At that time, he picks up a new claim form, covering the second week of unemployment, which he will turn in the third week of unemployment, etc.

Q. WHEN A PERSON HAS TO ESTABLISH A WAITING PERIOD, DO YOU SEE WHY HE MAY NOT GET HIS FIRST CHECK UNTIL HIS FOURTH WEEK OF UNEMPLOYMENT?

9. He must not be disqualified under any other section of the law. (See Section H. on disqualifications.)

D. How much are benefits?

The top benefit rate is $59.00 for the first six months of 1967.

1. The top benefit rate of $59.00 is paid to persons who start their claim after January 1, 1967, and who average $118.00 per week or over. No matter how high a person's earnings, he cannot receive a higher benefit rate. This top rate is set by law to represent 52½% of the average weekly wages of all covered workers in the state. It is re-figured every six months for new claims.

Q. DO YOU THINK $59.00 IS AN ADEQUATE AMOUNT OF MONEY FOR THE TOP RATE? WOULD YOU ADVOCATE A DEPENDENT'S ALLOWANCE?

2. Lower benefit rates are figured at 50% of the person's average weekly wage with an employer.

Q. WHAT WOULD A PERSON'S BENEFIT RATE BE WHO AVERAGES $110.00 A WEEK?

E. How long do benefits last?

Thirty-four weeks is the longest a person can draw unemployment benefits. This is based on at least 43 weeks of work in the previous year. If a person has worked less than 43 weeks, the number of weeks he can draw benefits is scaled down accordingly. Every time a person works for an employer, he builds up benefit rights. He may be entitled to as little as one-half week of benefits or as many as thirty-four depending on how long he worked for a particular employer.

Q. WHAT HAPPENS TO THE LONG-TERM UNEMPLOYED -- GENERALLY SOMEONE OVER 50 WHO IS UNSKILLED? SHOULD THE STATE PROGRAM PAY MORE THAN 34 WEEKS? SHOULD THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT STEP IN WITH SOME KIND OF PROGRAM?

F. Partial and Full Unemployment

If a person earns less than his benefit rate for a particular week (either in the form of wages, holiday pay, vacation pay, etc.), he is still entitled to unemployment compensation, either in the form of a whole check or a half-check. If his earnings are less than one-half of his benefit rate, he is entitled to a full check. If his earnings fall between one-half and all of his benefit rate, he is entitled to a half-check.

G. Wages Must be Reported Accurately

The gross amount of wages received for a given week must be reported accurately on the claim form for that week. Wages include holiday pay, vacation pay, dismissal pay, salaries, bonuses, incentives, board, room and anything of value received from an employer for services performed. Failure to report wages is usually considered a fraudulent claim for unemployment compensation. Penalties include cancellation of future weeks of unemployment compensation, possible fines and even jail sentences.

1. All wages and any job offer must be reported for the week in which the wages or job offer occurred.

2. Vacation pay must be reported for the week or weeks which are being considered the weeks of vacation, regardless of when the person receives the check for his vacation.

H. Disqualification Sections of the Law

The unemployment compensation law in Wisconsin has a harsh or restrictive disqualification section designed to deny unemployment compensation to persons under special circumstances. In certain types of cases, such as a quit without good cause or a discharge for misconduct, it is up to the employer to raise the denial issue. If benefits are finally denied after an investigation and possible appeals, and if this is the only employer in the picture, then all potential benefits are wiped out. There is no possibility of drawing benefits based on a person's work for that employer.

Q. UNDER SOME STATE LAWS, BENEFITS ARE ONLY SUSPENDED FOR SIX WEEKS AFTER WHICH THE CLAIMANT CAN DRAW BENEFITS BASED ON HIS PAST WORK FOR THAT EMPLOYER. WHAT ARE THE PRO'S AND CON'S OF EACH SYSTEM?

The following pages explain briefly the important disqualification sections of the law.

1. If a person quits a job without good cause, benefits are denied.

If a person does not have a compelling reason for quitting, benefits are denied. However, if an employee can prove he quit for one of the following reasons, he can get benefits.

a) If he quits to take another job and works in seven subsequent weeks

b) If he quits because he was physically unable to do the work assigned to him, but he can do other general work

c) If he quits because of the health of a member of his immediate family, and he is now available for work

d) If he quits for good cause attributable to the employer (such as--if the employer moves out of town)

2. If a person is discharged for misconduct connected with his employment, benefits are denied.

A discharge for misconduct is a serious event. Sometimes the employer has ample proof of misconduct, but other times, it is a borderline case depending upon how you evaluate the events leading up to the discharge.

a) Misconduct is loosely defined as any wilful, deliberate or substantial disregard of the employer's interests. This could include excessive absenteeism, tardiness, gross negligence, theft, dishonesty, drunkeness, insubordination, etc.

b) A discharge for inefficiency is not grounds on which to deny unemployment compensation. If an employee is discharged because he is unable to meet the production standards required by the employer, he is still eligible for benefits.

3. If a person refuses a job referral or refuses a job offer without good cause, benefits are suspended.

a) A person is allowed a six-weeks canvas period to canvas the labor market for a job of equal skill and comparable rate of pay to his previous job. During these six weeks, if the Employment Service refers him to a job, or if he receives a job offer on his own, he can turn it down only if it does not compare favorably to his former job.

b) After six weeks, a person has to look for and take a lesser job. He is expected to take any work so long as it does not pay a sub-standard rate of pay or have other sub-standard conditions connected with it.

4. If a person fails to return to work on a recall, benefits are denied.

If a person is unemployed and fails to return to work at the time of recall, benefits are denied. If the employer could not notify the employee of the recall because of a faulty or outdated address, this is considered the employee's fault.

5. If a person is physically unable to work or substantially unavailable for work, benefits are suspended.

No one can get unemployment compensation benefits if he is in poor health and unable to work or if other personal circumstances keep him from working. As soon as he can do some work again, benefits can be paid.

6. If a person has been notified by his employer of further work available in a particular week, but he does not do all the work there is available to him, benefits are denied.

Example: If a person has been on layoff and called in to work on Thursday and Friday, but doesn't start back until Friday (no matter what the reason), benefits are denied for that week if the employer raises the issue. Even if the employee could have earned only partial wages on Thursday and Friday, he is not entitled to any benefits for that week.

7. If a woman is laid-off and is pregnant, she can get benefits up to a certain suspension period.

A pregnant woman who is able to work can get benefits up until ten weeks prior to the week the child is expected. Benefits are then suspended until four weeks after the week the child is born and until she notifies her employer that she is willing to work again.

8. If a person is unemployed because of a strike in the establishment where he is employed, benefits are denied. Strikers cannot get unemployment compensation and neither can anyone else employed by the firm.

Q. IN NEW YORK STATE, STRIKERS CAN GET UNEMPLOYMENT AFTER SIX WEEKS. DO YOU THINK THIS IS REASONABLE?

I. Appeal Procedure

In every case of a disputed claim for unemployment compensation, the department goes to great lengths to try to determine the merits of the case. An investigation is made and an initial determination is issued, either allowing or denying benefits. A person has a perfect right to appeal any adverse decision all the way to the Industrial Commission, without charge to him. He can be represented by a union official or lawyer at any step of the way. The following are steps in the appeal procedure:

1. After an Initial Determination is mailed, the person has ten days to file an appeal. He can do this by going to his unemployment compensation office and they will help him fill out the appeal form, or he can do it himself. But it must be done within ten days of the mailing date.

2. A hearing is scheduled and a notice of the hearing is sent to both the worker and the employer. The hearing is conducted by a trial examiner representing the Industrial Commission. He tries to get all the facts on the table. This is the only hearing that will be held, no matter how far up the case is appealed. The person appealing should bring all information and evidence supporting his objection to the Initial Determination. If a person is represented by a lawyer, the lawyer can only charge 10 per cent of the maximum benefits at issue in the case.

3. The trial examiner issues an Appeal Tribunal Decision. If the worker disagrees with this decision, he has ten days to appeal the case to the Industrial Commission. The procedure in filing this appeal is the same as in filing the first appeal. The Industrial Commission will issue a decision and notify the parties to the dispute.

4. Any further appeal is through the courts. So far the appeal precedure has been part of the unemployment compensation procedure, but a further appeal goes to the Circuit Court of Dane County and then to the Wisconsin State Supreme Court. Both higher levels require hiring a lawyer.

J. Some Proposed Changes in Wisconsin's Unemployment Compensation Law

A number of changes have been proposed in Wisconsin's Unemployment Compensation Law and in the federal law which controls all the state programs (under the Social Security Act). These changes would mean an inevitable raise in the payroll tax and, therefore, have been opposed by most employer groups. There has been a continuing tugging and hauling in Congress and in State legislatures between these forces which would like unemployment compensation to pay substantially higher benefits and cover more workers and those forces which oppose any such extensions. Arthur Altmeyer, one-time administrator of the Social Security Act, estimates that average unemployment compensation benefits pay only 35 per cent of the average loss in wages and 20 per cent of the workers have no coverage. The AFL-CIO nationally have taken a strong position for strengthening unemployment compensation programs across the country. In order for unemployment compensation to be a more current and vital program, continuing political pressure will have to come from unions and working people who are most affected by the inadequacies of the program.

Following are some changes which have been proposed for the unemployment compensation program in Wisconsin:

1. Extend coverage to employers with one or more employees.

The law now applies to employers with four or more employees. Persons working for smaller firms (from one to three employees) should be eligible for benefits. (Change Section 108.02 (4) (d))

2. Extend coverage to include non-profit, charitable, religious and agricultural enterprises.

Persons working for hospitals and other denominational institutions need coverage. Farm workers are in particular need of protection against seasonal layoffs. Farms which employ four or more persons should cover their workers with unemployment compensation as they have been required to do under workmen's compensation. (Change Section 108.02 (4) (a))

3. Increase the wage-base on which the employer tax is paid from $3,600 to $5,600.

In order to finance a broader program of unemployment comepnsation, additional revenues should be raised by increasing the wage-base on which employer taxes are paid. Under the present law, only the first $3,600 of each employee's wages are taxed. This should be increased to $5,600 which is less than the wage-base used in applying the Social Security tax. (Change Section 108.02 (8) (b))

4. Eliminate the one-week waiting period.

The one-week waiting period is an annoyance and causes unnecessary delay in receiving benefits. The program should be in good enough financial condition to be able to pay benefits for the first week of unemployment. (Change Section 108.04 (3))

5. Eliminate the provision which cancels out all benefits in the cases of discharge for misconduct or a quit without good cause.

Under Wisconsin law, if an employee is found to be discharged for misconduct or have quit without good cause, all known potential claim for benefits is wiped out if there is only one employer. It is felt that the maximum penalty should be a delay of benefits rather than a denial. If an employee is still unemployed after six weeks. After that time, his continuing unemployment is caused by lack of job opportunities in the labor market and he should not be further penalized by his own conduct in quitting or being discharged. (Change Sections 108.04 (5) and (7) (a))

6. Extend unemployment compensation benefits beyond 34 weeks for the long-term unemployed.

Under a strengthened federal-state program of unemployment compensation, additional benefits would go to those who use up all their state allowance. Payments should continue up to 52 weeks, if needed, so long as the unemployed worker maintains his eligibility. Benefits should be payable during an approved training period.

7. Increase the maximum benefit rate.

Under the law, an individual's benefit rate is supposed to be 50 per cent of his average weekly wage. However, there is a maximum benefit rate which places a limitation on this formula. The maximum benefit rate is based on 52½ per cent of the average weekly wages of all covered workers in the State. For those who fall within this 52½ per cent, it is true that their benefit rate will amount to 50 per cent of their average weekly wage. But for the higher paid workers, they will receive a progressively smaller proportion of their wage loss. In order to attain a benefit rate of 50 per cent for the majority of these higher paid workers, the maximum benefit rate should be increased to 66 and 2/3 per cent of the average weekly wage in the State. (Change Section 108.05 (2) (c))

8. Eliminate the provision which requires the Industrial Commission to oppose further strengthening of federal standards.

This little known section of the law makes it mandatory that the Director of the Unemployment Compensation Law, or through some other representative of the Industrial Commission, oppose any further strengthening of federal standards over state unemployment compensation programs. The Industrial Commission is directed to lobby against federal standards, a position opposed by the AFL-CIO. (Change Section 108.14 (14))

"WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION"

I

HISTORY & NATURE OF THE ACT

Germany adopted its act in 1884 and England in 1897. Both these countries have disability insurance which covers benefits to employees for non-industrial disability. Wisconsin adopted its act in 1911, covering only work connected disability.

New York, New Jersey, California and Rhode Island provide non-industrial disability benefits. The general rule is that the employees and employers share the cost of the premiums for non-industrial disability benefits.

Some unions negotiate these benefits.

A system which covers only disability arising out of employment encourages insurance carrier or employer resistance to bona fide claims for workmen's compensation.

Organized labor should seek legislature covering non-industrial disability.

II

THE THEORY OF THE ACT & HOW IT WORKS

A worker is entitled to workmen's compensation benefits, "where at the time of injury, the employee is performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment."

Employee must prove that he was injured while engaged in some activity related in some way to his employment.

Injured on the Job

Most frequent type of accident occurs on the job while employee is struck by falling or moving object, where he slips or falls or where he strains or over exerts himself.

NOTE: Where employee slips or falls and cannot explain how or why, benefits will be denied.

NOTE: Employee should beware of giving statements to employer representative outside presence of attorney. If employee states, "I don't know what I slipped on," his case may be lost.

Injured While Going to and from Work

General Rule: Benefits paid only where injury takes place on company property, company steps or company owned parking lot.

Injured While Attending to Personal Needs

General Rule: Employee injured while eating lunch, on coffee break, going to toilet or during wash up time, if on company property, is entitled to benefits. Some exceptions where employee entitled to benefits while off company property.

Injured During Horseplay or Fighting

General Rule: Employee entitled to benefits unless he started the horseplay or was the aggressor in the fight.

III

GIVING PROPER NOTICE TO EMPLOYER

All injuries should be reported to employer immediately so as to dispel employer distrust. Especially true with back injury which at first may not appear very serious.

Obtain names and addresses of witnesses. It is also wise to notify union steward on date of injury for corroboration.

Notice & Filing Limitations

The law provides that an injured worker should give notice to his employer within thirty days of any industrial injury or occupational disease or within thirty days after employee knew or ought to have known the nature of his disability and its relationship to his employment.

Application must be filed with the Industrial Commission within two years from the date of the injury or death or from the date the employee or his dependant knew or ought to have known the nature of the disability, its relationship to his employment, unless employer knew or should have known within the two year period that the employee sustained the injury on which the claim is based.

Payment of compensation other than medical expenses is exception to above two year rule.

In any case, an employee must file his claim with the Industrial Commission within six years of the date of injury or disease or from the last date that compensation was paid -- (excludes medical expense payment.)

IV

KEEPING A WRITTEN RECORD

Employers and insurance carriers may contest a claim for a variety of reasons ranging from disbelief of injury to a desire to minimize payment of money.

While it is unrealistic to believe that every injured employee will keep a detailed record of his injury, the following list of information is helpful to an attorney in preparing for a workmen's compensation hearing.

1. The date of injury or first indication of an occupational disease. The date is very important.
2. The type of accident such as struck by an object, over-exertion, etc.
3. The nature of the injury or disease such as cut, sprain, hernia.

4. The part of the body affected such as a finger, low back, etc.

5. The kind of action that was taking place such as lifting, carrying, bending.

6. The source of injury such as machinery, hot or flammable substance.

7. The weight of the object causing the injury.

8. Physical symptoms such as sharp pain, stiffness, loss of motion, rash.

9. How long the symptoms lasted and if and when they recurred. (dates)

10. All doctors seen and on what dates.

11. Names of any witnesses who saw the accident or who the injured employee spoke to immediately following the injury.

12. All money spent on doctors, examinations, treatment, medicines, transportation. (Be sure to get receipts.)

13. All days and parts of days lost from work because of the disability.

14. Demand and keep any statement made to the employer or the insurance company representative.

15. Keep copies of any agreement of final receipt signed for a workmen's compensation claim.

V

UNLIMITED MEDICAL, HOSPITAL & SURGICAL EXPENSE PAID FOR

An injured employee who is injured at work or who suffers from occupational disease is entitled to unlimited hospital and medical attention, crutches, and artificial limbs and training in their use and lost time and traveling expense when undergoing treatment or examination.

However, employee must comply with employer's selection of medical panel of doctors and employer must sufficiently notify employees of panel and must have broad enough panel to satisfy Industrial Commission.

Some employers allow open panel of doctors.

Can go to any doctor in emergency.

Chiropractors not covered.

Employee should not reject reasonable examination or treatment where requested by employer.

VI

DISABILITY BENEFITS

Where employee misses less than ten days of work, he is not paid for first three days.

Temporary total disability payments are computed on 70 percent of employee's weekly wages with maximum of $68 per week.

Permanent partial disability based on scheduled benefits, i.e., loss of hand at wrist, 400 weeks. Ten per cent loss of use of hand would be 40 weeks. Maximum payment is $46 per week for permanent partial disability.

Reduction of permanent disability benefits by 2½ per cent for each year employee over 50 years of age. Maximum reduction 50 per cent.

Rehabilitation

Where employee has suffered from serious industrial injury or disease making it difficult or impossible to do his regular work, he may be eligible to receive up to 40 weeks of additional benefits while taking rehabilitation instruction.

Death Benefits

May vary in amount up to $19,430.00 (as of 1965), children under sixteen may be entitled to additional benefits and children over sixteen if mentally or physically incapacitated may be entitled to additional benefits.

Burial expenses up to $500 allowed.

No reduction in benefits because of age of deceased.

VII

BENEFITS MAY BE INCREASED OR DECREASED IF VIOLATION FOUND

Fifteen per cent increase if employer violates safety codes.

Employee or union can obtain copy of safety code by writing to Industrial Commission.

Safe Place Statute. Employer must do everything reasonably necessary and adopt and use methods and processes reasonably adequate, to protect the life, safety and welfare of his employees. If employer fails to comply with safe place statute, employee is entitled to fifteen per cent increase in benefits.

Employee loses fifteen per cent of benefits if injury occurs because of intoxication.

VIII

RETURNING TO WORK PROBLEMS

Employer may be fined up to $500 for refusing to re-employ injured employee. Each day's refusal could be considered a separate violation. Employee should make effort to return to work where employer or employer's physician make such request.

Further compensation due where recurrence of injury.

IX

STIPULATION VERSUS COMPROMISE

Where there is a dispute as to whether benefits are due, employee and employer can work out agreement before Commission.

If word stipulation is used, employee can reopen case within six year period should there be a recurrence or worsening of his injury or disease.

If word compromise is used, employee has only one year to reopen.

Employees advised to avoid compromise agreements, particularly where permanent disability involved.

X

DISPUTED CLAIMS & HEARINGS

Where employee desires a hearing, he must file an "Application for Adjustment of Claim" in triplicate with Industrial Commission. Forms can be obtained from Commission.

Where a claim is in dispute, an employee generally will be aided by retaining a lawyer. Attorney fees are 20 per cent of amount in dispute.

Employee must pay for medical examination and medical testimony even if successful in his claim.

THE NATURE OF "GOOD FAITH" IN COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

One of the most difficult problems confronting the National Labor Relations Board and the courts in interpreting the Taft-Hartley Act is defining the obligation to bargain in good faith. Sections 8(a)(5) and 8(b)(3) impose the obligation to bargain on employers and unions respectively. Section 8(d) states that collective bargaining:

> " . . . is the performance of the mutual obligation of the employer and the representative of his employees to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours and other conditions of employment, or the negotiation of an agreement, or any question arising thereunder, and the execution of a written contract incorporating any agreement reached if requested by either party, but such obligation does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession . . ."

The words of the statute provide only sketchy guidelines to the definition of the obligation to bargain. The NLRB and the courts have interpreted the statute as applying to both the conduct of the parties in the act of bargaining and the substantive issues in bargaining. Thus the NLRB requires that both parties meet and discuss their proposals, and it determines whether a party may refuse to discuss certain specific proposals.

Substantive issues in collecting bargaining are divided into three legal categories: (1) unlawful issues; (2) mandatory issues; and (3) non-mandatory issues. The parties are forbidden to agree on unlawful issues, e.g., the closed shop. Either party is within the law when it demands a mandatory issue and refuses to sign an agreement unless its demand is satisfied. Both parties are required to bargain about any mandatory subject. Unions and managements may agree to bargain about non-mandatory subjects and any agreement they voluntarily reach on non-mandatory subjects is lawful. Moreover, neither party is obligated to bargain on non-mandatory subjects, nor is either party permitted to insist upon a demand for a non-mandatory subject. A few illustrations on mandatory and non-mandatory subjects may help to clarify the significance of these categories.

The following are examples of mandatory subjects for collective bargaining:

1. Employee stock purchase plans
2. Profit sharing retirement plans
3. Group insurance
4. Pensions
5. Christmas bonuses
6. No-strike clauses

Suppose the union and management had agreed on wages, hours, seniority provisions, grievance procedures, and all other matters usually in an agreement. The union would not be guilty of refusal to bargain if it demanded, and struck for, an extra bonus to be distributed at Christmas. Nor would the employer be guilty of refusal to bargain if he refused to sign an agreement incorporating these understandings unless the union agreed to include a no-strike clause in the agreement.

The following are examples of non-mandatory subjects for collective bargaining:

1. Demands a union or employer post a performance bond.
2. Demands a union withdraw an unfair labor practice charge.
3. Demand a union forego certain appropriate bargaining subjects for a time.
4. Demand a supervisor be discharged.

An employer may agree with the union that a supervisor will be discharged as a means of improving the labor relations climate, or a union may withdraw its pending unfair labor practice charge against the employer for the same reason. However, the union is guilty of refusal to bargain if it strikes for the purpose of causing a supervisor's discharge, and the employer is innocent of refusal to bargain if he steadfastly refuses to listen to the union's protestations about the supervisor. The employer is guilty of refusal to bargain if he insists that he will not sign an agreement until the union withdraws its unfair labor practice charges.

In general, statutory law specifically prohibits relatively few collective bargaining clauses, e.g., closed shops and, under the 1959 law, "hot cargo" clauses.

The statutory right of employees and their duly designated representative to performance of an employer's duty to bargain concerning "wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment" may, under certain circumstances, be waived voluntarily pursuant to genuine collective bargaining. However, such a waiver, as with all waivers of statutory rights, must be clearly and unmistakably established and is not to be lightly inferred.

Whether certain contract provisions constituted a waiver by the union of bargaining rights was recently discussed by the Supreme Court in C + C Plywood Corporation. In C + C Plywood, the claim was asserted as an affirmative defense to what the NLRB found to be a prima facie violation of Section 8(a)(5) by the employer's unilateral institution of a premium pay schedule provided the employees meet certain production standards. The employer asserted it had the authority to do so under a contract provision permitting a premium rate above the contract rate to reward any particular employee for a special fitness or skill. The Board recognized that "in order to determine the validity of this waiver defense. . .we must necessarily evaluate the testimony as to what occurred during contract negotiations, and must interpret the wage clause in the contract." The Board found a refusal to bargain violation by concluding that there was not sufficient evidence to establish that in the course of negotiations the union waived its right to bargain about a wage incentive system. The Board rejected the employer's construction of the premium pay clause as granting it the privilege of selecting a group of employees for unilateral changes in compensation by raising the hourly contract rate contingent upon increased productivity.

In the New York Mirror case, the Board held the "zipper" clause of a contract, even when read in conjunction with other provisions, did not give the employer the privilege to unilaterally terminate its operations. The clause provided that the parties had fully bargained with respect to bargainable subjects and had settled those issues for the term of the contract. The employer contended the "zipper" clause, when read in conjunction with provisions concerning severance and termination pay, did constitute a waiver of the union's right to consultation and bargaining. In finding no waiver, the Board stated,

"This boilerplate clause, carried over from previous agreements, does no more than indicate that the parties embodied their full bargaining agreement in the written contracts. A wrap-up clause of this nature affords no basis for an inference that the agreement contains an implied understanding over and beyond those actually written in the agreement."

The following cases are submitted for the student to analyze the problems, applying the principles learned from the foregoing outline and from general classroom instruction and discussion. The two cases here presented do not pretend to be exhaustive, but rather suggestive. Moreover, having started with the cases and the dialogue that follows, the students can present to the class their own experience and observations.

CASE NO. ONE

FACTS OF THE CASE

The facts in this case are quite simple, the issue more complex. Article X (Hours of Work) of the collective bargaining agreement provided over many years as follows:

> "Unless changed by mutual agreement between the Company and the Union, the normal hours of employment shall be as follows:
> Shift No. 1: 8 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. less 30 minutes for meals
> Shift No. 2: 4:30 p.m. to 1 a.m. less 30 minutes for meals
> Shift No. 3: 1 a.m. to 8 a.m. less 30 minutes for meals

However, since approximately 1952, the Die Cast Department had begun and terminated each shift an hour earlier than the schedule described in the above provision of the contract. There is no evidence as to the circumstances under which this arrangement came into being.

On April 23, 1967, the Company posted a bulletin announcing that effective April 30, 1967, shifts in the Die Cast Department were to begin and end one hour later than had been the practice. The new hours, therefore, coincided with those provided in Article X (Hours of Work).

Posting on the bulletin had been preceded by discussion between the Union and the Company. The parties differ on their construction of these meetings. The Union maintains that their purpose was to reach mutual agreement on the proposed change, and that it was unable to agree. The Company maintains that the purpose was to inform the Union of its intention and to accomplish the transaction with a minimum of friction.

The evidence discloses the change by the Company was initiated in good faith and was not discriminatory.

The Management Rights Clause provides:

> The right to hire, promote, discharge or discipline for just cause, maintain discipline and efficiency of employees, determine the type of products to be manufactured, the schedule of production, the location of plants, the methods, processes and means of manufacturing are examples of management prerogatives. However, it is understood that the company retains all of its rights to manage and operate the business except as may be limited by an express provisions of this Agreement.

The last sentence was not a part of preceding agreements. The contract contains no clause generally preserving past practices but only practices with respect to certain specific matters.

QUESTIONS

1. Since the contract contains no clause generally preserving past practices, does it lie with the domain of management to unilaterally change the starting time? Why?

2. Would you file an unfair labor practice charge on the employer's action? Why?

3. Aside from the above, what additional facts might be necessary to establish a prima facie case in filing an unfair labor practice case to the NLRB?

4. What language would you use in alleging the unfair labor practice? Why?

5. If the employer offered to discuss the change with the union at any time after April 30, would this change your decision to file the unfair labor practice charge? Why?

CASE NO. TWO

FACTS OF THE CASE

In March, 1966, an independent Union was certified by the NLRB as the bargaining representative for a union comprising all production and maintenance employees of the Fat Cat Corporations consisting of about one hundred employees. On September 1, 1966, after a series of bargaining sessions, the parties reached agreement and signed a one year contract expiring September 1, 1967.

The agreement does not set forth any comprehensive rules governing employee conduct. It does: (1) allude to safety practices, and (2) reserves to the Employer the right to discharge any employee who, without permission from the Employer, distributes literature in the plant during working hours.

During the course of bargaining over the contract in 1966, the parties did not specifically discuss plant rules.

At the time of certification, the Employer had an unpublished series of plant rules setting forth when disciplinary action would be taken because of repeated tardiness or absenteeism. The Employer found the implementation and administration of this procedure to be inconsistent among the various foremen. To remedy the situation, the Employer on April 21, 1967 instituted a new series of absentee and tardiness rules setting forth the reasons absenteeism and tardiness could be excused and providing points for each unexcused absence or tardiness. Accumulation of a specified number of points in a given period would then result in disciplinary action. The Employer furnished a copy of the new procedure to the Union on April 18, three days before it was put in effect.

The Management Rights Clause states:

> Management Rights: The direction of the working forces including the rights to hire, transfer, promote, suspend or discharge for proper cause, to adopt shop rules and the right to relieve employees from duty because of lack of work or for any other legitimate reason, and to maintain discipline and efficiency in production is confined exclusively to the Company, provided that no such action by the Company is in conflict with or circumvents any provisions of this contract. In addition, there is reserved to the Company all the regular and customary functions of management which are not limited by the terms of this contract.

The contract further contains the following language on discharge:

> Discharge: The Company has the right to discipline or discharge employees for just cause. Just cause shall be construed to include sabotage, drunkness, criminal acts, inefficiency, incompetency, insubordination, repeated tardiness, absenteeism, carrying of contagious or infectious disease, creating unsanitary conditions in plant, and the violation of company rules which are not in conflict with this agreement.

The contract also contained the following "zipper" clause:

> This agreement sets forth the entire agreement and understanding between the parties hereto and all prior understandings or agreements, oral or written, are merged herein. This agreement may not be changed except in writing and signed by a proper and duly authorized representative of each of the parties hereto.

I. The Union Committee Consists of:

Steward: _____

Chief Steward: _____

Local President: _____

Negotiating Committee: _____

II. The Company Committee Consists of:

Foreman: _____

Plant Superintendent: _____

Director of Industrial Relations: _____

The act takes place in the office of the Director of Industrial Relations. Each side must carefully plan its strategy in light of the availability of: (a) the grievance machinery (use own contracts); and (b) Unfair Labor Practice Charges (forms are provided).

QUESTIONS

1. Has the Employer violated his duty to bargain by instituting the absentee procedure? Why?

2. If the parties had discussed an absentee procedure in their 1966 negotiations, would the instituting of the procedure in April, 1966 be a refusal bargain violation? Why?

LAW OF COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

In 1935 Congress passed the National Labor Relations Act. (The text is in your folder.) This Act protects the right of workers to organize and bargain collectively. It is enforced by the National Labor Relations Board. Basically, the Board has jurisdiction over all business which "affect" interstate or foreign commerce.

Unfair Labor Practices: Proceedings before the Board are begun by CHARGES filed with the regional office. There are 31 regional offices in the country including offices at Milwaukee, Chicago and Minneapolis.

I. ARBITRATION versus NLRB JURISDICTION

The nation's labor relations policies favor voluntary arbitration of disputes. The Board will, therefore, not second guess an arbitrator's decision as long as: 1) it does not repudiate the Act; 2) it is fair; and 3) all parties agreed to be bound by the arbitrator.

Discussion Questions

1. Two employees were dissatisfied with Union A, the incumbent union. While they were assisting Union B in raiding the plant, they were fired allegedly "for cause." An arbitration panel consisting of representatives of the employer and the incumbent union rejected the employee's grievance.

   Should the NLRB set aside the arbitrator's decision and decide the case for itself? (Auburn Rubber Company, 156 NLRB 301)

2. An employee was discharged for threatening to go to the NLRB for advice concerning his rights under the contract. The arbitrator held this was a discharge for "just cause" since an employee has no right to make unjustified threats against his boss.

   Should the Board reverse the arbitrator and order the employee reinstated? (Virginia - Carolina Freight Lines, 155 NLRB 447)

II. REPRESENTATION CASES

The Act requires that an employer bargain with the representative designated by a majority of his employees in a unit appropriate for collective bargaining.[1] But it does not require that the representative be designated by any particular procedure as long as the representative is clearly the choice of a majority of the employees.

As one method for employees to select a majority representative, the Act authorizes the Board to conduct representation elections.[2] The Board may conduct such an election after a petition has been filed by or on behalf of the employees, or by an employer who has been confronted with a claim for recognition from an individual or a labor organization.

Incident to its authority to conduct elections, the Board has the power to determine the unit of employees appropriate for collective bargaining,[3] and formally to certify a collective-bargaining representative upon the basis of the results of the election. Once certified by the Board, the bargaining agent is the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit for collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment.

The Act also empowers the Board to conduct elections to decertify incumbent bargaining agents which have been previously certified, or which are being currently recognized by the employer. Decertification petitions may be filed by employees, or individuals other than management representatives, or by labor organizations acting on behalf of employees.

A. EXISTING CONTRACT AS BAR TO AN ELECTION

Generally, the Board will not hold an election during the term of a valid, written, properly executed and binding contract. The contract must be for a definite period and not longer than three years. The Board will entertain a petition for an election during the period from 90 to 60 days before the expiration of the contract.

Discussion Questions

1. During the middle of a two year contract, the Ace Nut Co. moved its plant, together with almost all employees, a mile down the road to a new location. An outside union filed a petition for an election at the new location. The union at the old plant objected.

[1]Secs. 8(a)(5) and 9(a).
[2]Sec. 9(c)(1).
[3]Sec. 9(b).

1. Should the Board order a new election? Should the old contract be considered binding at the new location?

2. The employer had separate dairy and ice cream plants. It merged the operation into a new modern single plant. Both old plants had different unions and contracts. Both unions demanded representation rights without an election. A third union filed a petition for election. The employer threw up his hands.

   Are the existing contracts still valid? If not, why not? (Kroger Co., 155 NLRB 546, General Extrusion Co., 121 NLRB 1165)

3. A petition was filed 59 days before the expiration of the existing contract. Not sure the contract was valid, the NLRB held a hearing at which it determined the contract was valid. On the day before the contract was to expire, the union and the company signed a new three year contract.

   Should the Board order an election or make the employees wait three more years to see if they really want the incumbent union? (Electric Boat Division, 158 NLRB No. 95)

4. Normally the Board will not permit a test of the union's majority status for at least one year after certification. Suppose the employer refused to give the union certain information it needed in bargaining for a period of five months.

   Should the union get any extra time if it appears at the end of a year that most of the employees have lost faith in the union?

B. UNITS APPROPRIATE FOR BARGAINING

General Rule: Discussion - Section 9, Taft-Hartley Act

1. Insurance Industry Units: Should a single district office be the appropriate bargaining unit where so requested by the union? (Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 156 NLRB 1408; State Farm, 158 NLRB #84)

2. Grocery Store Units: A unit consisting of less than all the employees of a store may be appropriate. But should an election be directed in a unit consisting of grocery clerks, but excluding meat cutters where no one is seeking to represent the meat department? (Mock Road Super Duper, 156 NLRB 983)

   What about the delicatessen department?

3. Department Store and Warehouse Units: There can be separate units consisting of only selling or non-selling employees. There can also be a single unit consisting of all (wall to wall) employees. The decision in a given case will largely depend on the facts of the case such as:

   -history of bargaining
   -skills of workers
   -degree of common supervision
   -functional integration of duties
   -working conditions

   (Bonwit Teller, Inc., 159 NLRB #62; Sears Roebuck & Co., 154 NLRB 1818)

4. Craft Units: Traditional crafts can properly bargain separately from selling employees in a department store (example: electricians); or from production and maintenance employees in a plant (example: plumbers, welders; Union Carbide, 156 NLRB 634). However, the Board is unlikely to sever tool and die makers from an already existing unit of production and maintenance employees. (Rohr Corp., 157 NLRB 1351)

5. Professional Employees: Section 9(b)(1) of the Act

6. Race: Race cannot be a factor in determining the unit a union will represent. This is true even where historically employment patterns were set by discriminatory hiring practices.

C. CONDUCT OF REPRESENTATION ELECTIONS

Section 9(c)(1) of the Act provides that if, upon a petition filed, a question of representation exists, the Board must resolve it through an election by secret ballot. The election details are left to the Board. Such matters as voting eligibility, timing of elections, and standards of election conduct are subject to rules laid down in the Board's Rules and Regulations and in its decisions.

Board elections are conducted in accordance with strict standards designed to assure that the participating employees have an opportunity to determine, and to register a free and untrammeled choice in the selection of, a bargaining representative. Any party to an election who believes that the standards have not been met may file timely objections to the election with the regional director under whose supervision it was held. In that event, the regional director may, as the situation warrants, either make an administrative investigation of the objections or hold a formal hearing to develop a record as the basis for decision.

If the election was held pursuant to a consent-election agreement authorizing a determination by the regional director, the regional director will then issue a decision on the objections which is final.[4] If the election was held pursuant to a consent agreement authorizing a determination by the Board, the regional director will then issue a report on objections which is then subject to exceptions by the parties and decision by the Board.[5] However, if the election was one directed by the Board,[6] the regional director may (1) either make a report on the objections, subject to exceptions with the decision to be made by the Board, or (2) dispose of the issues by issuing a decision, which is then subject to limited review by the Board.[7]

1. Employer Petitions challenging incumbent union's majority status must be supported by some evidence to show that there is reasonable grounds to believe the union no longer represents a majority of the employees.

2. Timing of Election in a Seasonal Industry: Elections are only held at peak employment periods in seasonal industries. Sometimes this frustrates the need for a prompt election.

   Discussion Question: Where a canning company has one peak crop but a series of shorter and smaller peaks for other crops, should the Board make the employees wait almost a year for an election? (Elsa Canning Co., 514 NLRB 1810)

[4]Rules and Regulations, sec. 102.62(a).
[5]Rules and Regulations, secs. 102.62(b); 102.69(c).
[6]Rules and Regulations, secs. 102.63; 102.67.
[7]Rules and Regulations, secs.,102.69(c); 102.69(e).

3. Disclosure of Names and Addresses of Employees: Within seven days after an election has been ordered or agreed upon, the employer must file with the regional director a list of names and addresses of all eligible voters.

   Why is this needed by the union?

   Doesn't this violate the rights of the employer and give the union an unfair advantage?

4. Secrecy of Ballot: All employees are entitled to secret voting in a Board election. Sam Jones, who was strongly anti-union, remembering the famous story of John Hancock in signing the Declaration of Independence (large so John Bull can read it without specs), wrote across the bottom of his ballot, "I voted no big enough so the union bosses could see it through the smoke from their expensive cigars." When the Board agent opened the box and counted the ballots, he found that Sam's vote would decide the election.

   Should that vote be counted? (J. Brenner & Sons, 154 NLRB 656)

5. Conduct Affecting Elections: An election will be set aside, and a new election directed, if the election campaign was accompanied by conduct which, in the Board's view, created an atmosphere of confusion or fear of reprisals which interfered with the employees' exercise of their freedom of choice of a representative as guaranteed by the Act.

   In evaluating the interference resulting from specific conduct, the Board does not attempt to assess its actual effect on the employees, but rather concerns itself with whether it is reasonable to conclude that the conduct tended to prevent the free formation and expression of the employees' choice. In making this evaluation the Board treats each case on its facts, taking an ad hoc rather than a per se approach in resolution of the issues.

   a. Election Propaganda: The Board will set aside an election where either party engages in campaign trickery or serious misrepresentation. It will not upset an election merely because of exaggeration or because a message is vague or could be misconstrued.

a. Election Propaganda (continued)

Discussion Questions

1. Just before an election, a union handbill stated that several of its contracts in the area "provide" 47¢ per hour wage increases. The union did not point out that the increases were granted in steps over a three year period. The union won the election.

   Should the Board set it aside as an omission which is part of a deliberate pattern of deception? (Russell-Newman Mfg., 158 NLRB No. 117)

2. On the day of the NLRB election the employer took $6.00 from each employee's pay check. He placed it in a separate envelope which stated, "This is the estimated amount the union will take out of your pay each month." The union lost the election and objected to the employer's conduct within five days of the election. It took the position that the union had set no dues structure and since no Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission referendum had been held, no employee had to pay any dues.

   How should the Board rule? (Caressa, Inc., 158 NLRB #150)

b. Employer Talks to Employee Groups: An employer interferes with an election where he:

   1) holds mass meetings with employees within 24 hours of the election

   2) holds meetings in places where managerial authority is based.

Discussion Questions

The company president, U.B. Loyal, called the employees together at 9:00 a.m., October 3, 1967, in the plant cafeteria. He discussed the NLRB election which was to begin the following day at 10:00 a.m. Mr. Loyal indicated that the whole company was really "one big, happy family" and had no need of outside union representatives.

1) Did the company interfere with the election? Why?

2) Resolve the following issues:

-24 hour rule

-content of speech

-area of managerial authority

III. UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The Board is empowered under Section 10(a) of the Act "to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice (listed in Section 8) affecting commerce."

In general, Section 8 prohibits an employer or a union or their agents from engaging in certain specified types of activity which Congress has designated as unfair labor practices. The Board, however, may not act to prevent or remedy such activities until a charge of an unfair labor practice has been filed with it. Such charges may be filed by an employer, an employee, a labor organization, or any other person irrespective of any interest they might have in the matter. They are filed with the regional office of the Board in the area where the alleged unfair labor practice occurred.

A. SECTION 8(a)(1): EMPLOYER INTERFERENCE WITH EMPLOYEE RIGHTS

1. Limitations Upon Communication

A collective bargaining agreement provided that the company would provide the union with bulletin boards for "union business." The contract further provided that there would be no other distribution of union material on company time or premises. A group of employees wanted to bring in a rival union to represent the workers. When they distributed some handbills during a lunch break, they were issued warning slips.

a. Did the company violate Section 8(a)(1)? (Take a look at Section 8(b)(1)(a).)

b. Could the union get these men discharged for filing a decertification petition?

c. Could it bring them up on charges before the union executive board?

2. Discharges for Engaging in Protected Activity

a. Sarah Jones, a clerical worker, arrived for work on September 29, 1967, only to find that the production workers, who had been bargaining with the employer for some time, had set up a picket line. Sarah, whose father had told her about unions, refused to cross the line. She was promptly informed of her discharge. When the strike ended, Sarah went back to work with the rest of the strikers. They were all received, but Sarah's discharge was not rescinded.

-Is this discrimination? (Canada Dry Corp., 154 NLRB 1763)

-Should Sarah get her job back?

-What about back-pay?

-Does it matter whether or not Sarah will be covered by the contract (or in the bargaining unit)?

b. Suppose Sarah had told the company she would not cross the picket line, but would come in at night and perform her clerical duties? (Cooper Thermometer Co., 154 NLRB 502)

c. The Restaurant Workers Union picketed Sneaky Pete's Saloon to protest substandard conditions. Al, the bartender, continued to work, but after his shift ended, joined the picket line while still wearing his uniform. Pete came running out of the saloon shouting, "You are a disgrace to the uniform. A man in uniform has no business picketing. You're fired!"

-Those whose names begin with A through L, be prepared to argue on Al's behalf.

-Those whose names begin with M through Z, argue the employer's position on the discharge.

(Edir, Inc., d/b/a Wolfie's, 159 NLRB No. 72)

d. The Lumber Company regularly issued its pay checks without sufficient funds to cover them. Although the contract prohibited strikes until the grievance procedure was exhausted, the employees got fed up and went on strike to protest the practice.

-What is the normal effect of a no-strike clause?

-Are there any exceptions to the general rule?

-In the case at hand are the employees legitimately subject to discharge? (San Juan Lumber Co., 154 NLRB 1153)

e. Two employees wrongly thought the employer had underpaid them. They filed a complaint with the Industrial Commission. After carefully determining that the employees were wrong, the company fired them for the wrongful charge.

Has the employer violated Section 8(a)(1) and Section 7? (B & M Excavating, 155 NLRB 1152)

f. Three union members refused to cross a legally authorized picket line. The union brought them up on charges and threatened to fine them. The company paid for a lawyer to defend them.

- Is this a legitimate function of the employer? (Leeds & Northrup Co., 155 NLRB 129)

- Suppose the company offered to pay their fines. Would the result be different?

B. SECTION 8(a)(2): EMPLOYER SUPPORT OF LABOR ORGANIZATION

Section 8(a)(2) makes it unlawful for an employer "to dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization or contribute financial or other support to it."[8] The section provides, however, that an employer may permit employees to confer with him during working hours without loss of pay.

Discussion Questions

1. The union officers met monthly with management on non-working hours. The company paid them at their regular hourly rate.

   Does this violate Section 8(a)(2)? (Farmbest, Inc., 154 NLRB 1421)

2. A clause in the Collective Bargaining Agreement provided for "automatic termination of policies, benefits and provisions in the event there was a change in the bargaining representative."

   Does this clause illegally assist the incumbent union?

[8]Sec. 8(a)(1) contemplates a "labor organization" as defined in Sec. 2(5)

C. EMPLOYER DISCRIMINATION AGAINST EMPLOYEES

See Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

D. THE BARGAINING OBLIGATION

Discussion Questions

1. After a successful campaign during which five of six employees joined the union, the union representative walked into the owner's office and stated it had majority status and spread out the five cards before the boss. Although he probably saw the signatures, the owner simply stated he preferred to have an NLRB election before bargaining.

   Has the employer illegally refused to bargain in good faith? (John P. Serpa, 155 NLRB 99)

2. Suppose the employer started to bargain and then decided he wanted an election? (Jem Mfg. Co., 156 NLRB 643)

3. In the first situation would the result be different if the employer also sent employees letters and gave speeches threatening to cut wages if the union became the bargaining representative? (Lake Butter Apparel Co., 158 NLRB No. 85)

E. SUCCESSOR EMPLOYER'S OBLIGATION TO BARGAIN

Discussion Questions

The Acme Bolt Co. had been represented by Local 1001 for many years. On June 1, 1967, their contract expired. Although the company and Local 1001 bargained from May through July, no agreement was reached. After expiration, the company simply continued to honor the terms of the old contract.

The Sure Fit Parts Co. bought Acme Bolt on August 1, 1967. Sure Fit purchased all assets and continued the plant, manufacturing the same products. All employees were hired but at new rates of pay and under different conditions of employment (some better - some worse).

On August 15, 1967, Sure Fit recognized Local 1001 and began to bargain. It bargained in good faith toward a new contract but refused to return to the old contract while bargaining.

1. Did Sure Fit have an obligation to bargain with Local 1001 without an NLRB election?

2. Since the contract had expired, was Sure Fit free to change conditions?

3. What can Local 1001 do in this situation?

   a. _____

   b. _____

   c. _____

   d. _____

4. What should it do? (Overnite Transportation Co., 157 NLRB 1185)

F. EMPLOYEE RIGHTS: UNION CONDUCT

Read Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

Discussion Question

Local 1341 had a very imaginative organizing technique. During the workday, thirty of their sympathizers would invade an unorganized shop and sign up members at their work stations. On a number of occasions, plant managers were heard to shout desperately, "You can't do this!" as the organizers went ahead and did it. Often work stopped and picketing went on in front of the plant.

The company filed charges against the union charging violations of Section 8(b)(1)(A).

The union denied the charges. It pointed out there was neither violence nor economic coercion involved in the organizational drive.

-Who is right? Why? (B. Brown Associates, 157 NLRB 615)

COMMENT ON PROPOSED FEDERAL SAFETY LEGISLATION

Below is a position statement from the Wisconsin Department of Industry, Labor and Human Relations on the proposed Federal Occupational Health and Safety Act (S. 2864 and H. R. 14816).

For a different view see: "Job Safety, A National Tragedy," in the American Federationist, April, 1968. That article is the testimony given by George Meany before a House Education and Labor Subcommittee.

WISCONSIN DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY, LABOR AND HUMAN RELATIONS

Position Statement on: February 28, 1968

THE OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY ACT OF 1968:

The companion bills, S 2864 and HR 14816, would establish a federal occupational safety and health program administered by the U. S. Department of Labor. In brief, the Act would do these things:

1. After an interim period of 545 days (18 months) all state laws covering occupational health and safety and applying to firms in interstate commerce would be abrogated.

2. To take the place of state law and administration, the Secretary of Labor would establish federal standards governing industrial health and safety, and enforce these standards by administrative orders, inspections, judicial proceedings, and public contracts.

3. The bill provides a penalty of up to $1000 per each violation and the possible shut down of operations.

4. The legislation contains authority for the Secretary to make contracts with the states for the administration of the law or parts of it.

The Wisconsin Department of Industry, Labor and Human Relations opposes the passage of the Occupational Health and Safety Act for the following reasons:

1. The Department opposes the concept that federal control can solve or even reduce the rate of job accidents and injuries. The sponsors of this legislation butress their case by pointing to the toll of job accidents and injuries. Deaths and injuries resulting from traffic and crime are equally serious. Thus the federal government could make a similar case for taking over the administration and enforcement of state traffic and criminal laws.

But the main flaw in the Act is the supposition that federal standards and strong enforcement can materially reduce accidents and deaths. Safety authorities throughout the Nation, including the National Safety Council, agree that 75 percent of all job accidents arise not from unsafe conditions, but from unsafe acts. The reduction of unsafe acts depends upon education and cooperation. The Wisconsin job safety program provides afor about 90 percent education as against 10 percent enforcement. Beyond statistical research, we find no reference to education in the federal language. Further, we feel that any alleged improvement in standards will be more than offset in reducing injuries through the loss of cooperation. Cooperative and educational efforts are more successfuly when they take place between business and the units of government closest to them and the problems.

2. Under the proposed law, Wisconsin's codes and standards built up through 53 years of experience would, for all practical effects, be null and void. These codes have been developed by countless thousands of hours of effort by volunteer advisory committees from industry, labor and the professions. We feel that it would be impossible for a federal agency to duplicate this experience in 18 months, or even 18 years.

As a second point under "2", we feel that the structures in which men work and equipment is installed is just as important from the standpoint of safety as is the equipment itself. Approximately 25 percent of Wisconsin's budget in Industrial Safety is devoted to the inspection of plans and structures under construction for their safety features. We find no reference to buildings and plan inspection in the proposed federal law.

3. Wisconsin law provides for a penalty only when an unsafe condition remains uncorrected. The proposed federal law does not allow for a correction period. In Wisconsin we have found that most violations of the code are inadvertent. We feel it is unrealistic and unduly harsh to impose a $1000 fine upon a business which inadvertently violates one of several thousand code provisions. Such imposition would certainly work to the disadvantage of cooperative efforts as discussed above.

4. The proposed law provides that the Secretary may make grants up to 90 percent of the state's cost for collection of information; increasing enforcement capabilities, and otherwise improving the administration and enforcement of state occupational safety and health laws.

From this language it does not appear that we would be paid for the day-to-day routine of education, inspection and enforcement, even if we were doing this job to the satisfaction of the Secretary. If this law passes, it seems Wisconsin would be forced into doing one of the following, none of which are satisfactory or practical.

a. Discontinue our occupational safety program in its entirety and turn over this work to the U. S. Department of Labor.

b. Maintain an inspection and enforcement bureau at state expense to enforce federal codes and standards.

c. Maintain an inspection and enforcement bureau to cover those businesses not engaged in interstate commerce, and to enforce those parts of our codes which are above and beyond the federal codes.

Finally, we believe that federalization of job safety may well have the opposite effect of that intended. We believe that it is unnecessary in Wisconsin, unworkable in Wisconsin, and will in fact work to the detriment of the job safety program now in effect in Wisconsin.

Tax corporate profits for warring on poverty

Michigan's Senator Phil Hart is against any general tax increase now or the near future. Instead he's for tapping soaring corporate profits to keep Great Society programs running.

Hart is chairman of the Senate Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee. After-tax corporate profits have climbed 88 percent in the past nine years, he charges, in part because there is no longer enough competition to keep prices at minimum levels.

Hart said that any new tax laws should be aimed at reducing excessive corporate profits, providing tax incentives to firms that cut prices, and discouraging business mergers.

"If the nation is troubled by high prices and insufficient revenue why not devise a tax program that attacks both problems simultaneously?" he asked last week.

Hart delivered a ringing defense of Great Society programs, insisting that the domestic war on poverty, crime, air and water pollution, poor education and inadequate housing is just as important as defending democracy abroad.

"These programs," he said, "take only about 10 cents of every federal dollar.

"If I thought a drastic cut in this spending would have any effect on inflation I might be for it. But it wouldn't."

"If I thought a general tax increase would have a significant effect on high prices, I might be for it. But it wouldn't."

. . . in ten years, under the present trend, two-thirds of the nation's manufacturing assets will be owned by 200 firms."

"American industry is riding the crest of the greatest profit boom in history."

He said the Subcommittee's studies of economic concentration indicate that a general tax increase or a drastic cut in government spending could trigger a business slowdown but would probably not have much effect on prices.

"These measures would be an attempt to reduce prices by reducing demand. But our economy very often no longer responds to this kind of classic economic theory and we are kidding ourselves if we fail to recognize it," he continued.

"They would work if consumer demand was outstripping productive capacity—but it is not.

"They would work if manufacturers would hurriedly

lower prices in the face of reduced demand. But there is little evidence that they would and much evidence that they would not."

Ruefully acknowledging that "any fellow who begins lecturing on the nation's economic structure is not likely to draw much of a crowd," Hart said it is nevertheless interesting to note:

1. That manufacturing labor costs have gone up by less than 2½ percent since 1957-59 while consumer prices have climbed 14 percent.

2. That after-tax corporate profits in the same period have jumped by $20 billion yearly (88 percent).

"That indicates clearly enough," he said, "that higher prices have little relationship to higher costs. And prices also no longer bear a clear relationship to demand.

"So why hit consumers, already hard pressed by high prices and high interest rates, with another punishing blow in the form of a tax hike when it won't have the desired result anyway?

"And why sacrifice essential domestic programs—such as the War on Poverty—to an economic theory which in many cases is not applicable?"

Hart said that competition in many of the nation's basic Subsidies pour out of U.S. Treasury, while editorial and political critics try to chop programs to make America stronger by wiping out poverty.

How Rich Are Getting Richer

AMERICANS with annual incomes of $1 million or more actually pay out only 26.7 per cent in federal income taxes, even though a 70 per cent rate is supposed to apply to incomes over $200,000. That's revealed in a study made by Joseph A. Pechman, a top economist for the Brooking Institution, a conservative economic research agency.

The rich in the million-plus bracket pay out a smaller percentage in taxes than do those with incomes of $100,000 to $1 million, Pechman said. Tax loopholes—chiefly the "capital gains" loophole—explain the disparity, he added. Those in the million-plus bracket get much of their income capital gains—that is investment profits—and these are taxed at half the regular rate or 25 per cent, whichever is lower.

Those in the $100,000 to $1 million bracket pay somewhat higher than 26.7 per cent in income taxes, but still an exceptionally low amount. The highest tax percentage is paid by those in the $150,000 to $200,000 bracket, but even there it's only 29.1 per cent.

Pechman cited many other disparities in the tax laws, and proposed various corrections, though he did not recommend abandonment of the notorious capital gains tax loophole.

ACTUALLY, the capital gains device is one of numerous loopholes in the tax laws, as often reported.

The magazine U.S. News & World Report turns the spotlight on another one that has been growing in recent years—among the wealthy. This it describes as the "Arts Dodge" and it goes on to declare:

"Cheating on income taxes by means of art donations has become a widespread racket in this country, and officals say the practice still is spreading. The gimmick is based on claiming excessive deductions."

This example of how the gimmick works is given by the magazine:

"A high-income taxpayer buys a painting for, say, $25,000. Then he gets a cooperative art dealer to appraise it at $80,000. The buyer then donates the painting to a church, school or other tax-exempt organization and he claims an $80,000 deduction on his income tax return.

"If this taxpayer is in the 50 per cent bracket of the income tax, the deductions reduces his tax by $40,000. That tax saving is a clear profit of $15,000 on his $25,000 purchase."

THE U.S. NEWS quotes Internal Revenue Service officials as saying that "ingenious taxpayers have devised many variations of the practice"; also that the practice is "certainly increasing and involves good many millions of dollars of lost (tax) revenues each year."

Pechman's report and the U.S. News article underscore what Labor has often stressed editorially—that there's need for action in Congress to plug these and other notorious loopholes, so that income taxes will truly be based on ability to pay, not on ability to evade.

After all, workers pay their taxes in full through payroll deductions. Why should any other standard apply to the wealthy?

industries has diminished to the point where one corporation sets prices to reach a target profit and others follow along.

"This lock-step pricing," he said, "means that price competition is not at work to force the sharing of high profits with the consumer in the form of lower prices.

"American industry is riding the crest of the greatest profit boom in history. At one time, a 10 percent return on net worth was considered good. Now, 20 percent is not uncommon.

"Yet prices go up, very often in industries that are operating far below productive capacity, indicating that the price hike is not in response to an overwhelming demand exceeding an insufficient supply.

"Are price increases a response to increased labor costs? Not likely, in view of the fact that average productivity is on the increase—meaning that labor costs per unit are going down.

"Economic theory presumes that a high-profit situation should attract new competitors who want to cut into the gravy train. But what small businessman is going to start a new auto plant or chemical complex?"

Hart added that business mergers and sell-outs are being undertaken at such a rapid rate that in 10 years, under the present trend, two-thirds of the nation's manufacturing assets will be owned by 200 firms.

He said: "Competition is still the factor we depend on most for low prices but competition clearly does not flourish when competitors are declining in number."

"Why hit consumers, already hard pressed by high prices and high interest rates, with another punishing blow in the form of a tax hike when it won't have the desired result anyway?"

If a tax increase proves necessary, Hart offered this program:

1. The 48 percent tax ceiling on corporate profits should be raised—allowing a graduated levy of perhaps up to 75 percent on firms with a very high profit rate.

"This would have the effect," he said, "of encouraging firms to share high profits with the consumer in the form of lower prices rather than turning them over to the government."

2. Economists should begin exploring the feasibility of tax incentives to firms that lower prices.

"Using tax policy to further the national interest is certainly not a novel idea. And if we assume that a controlled price decline would contribute to the country's well-being, then a tax program might be one of the best ways to effect it."

Hart said that his Subcommittee economists were already studying the idea and added his hopes that administration experts would also examine it.

3. Tax law revision to discourage business mergers and the ingestion of small companies by large corporations.

"Today, the tax laws provide one of the most compelling

"These programs take only about 10 cents of every federal dollar."

reasons for many small companies to sell out to big corporations. Why should the government provide incentives to accelerate a trend that is not in the interest of a free enterprise society?"

Hart added that increasing concentration of economic power is a problem that few recognize and fewer are willing to face.

"When competition diminishes to the point where it is no longer a regulatory force in the marketplace, then some other force must be substituted."

Hart said that government has two courses open to it.

One is to take action to insure competition by actively combating economic concentration. The other is to allow concentration trends to progress relatively unhindered, thus making eventual wage and price controls inevitable.

"Government wage and price controls are certainly not attractive possibilities to me," Hart said. "Competition is certainly much more efficient. But with competition slowly fading, price control would be the only available substitute."

WEEKEND WRAPUP

Peace in Vietnam still seems far, far away. Yet nobody in Washington would begrudge our fighting men every last cent they ask for to wage war or seek peace, whatever it is. Why, then, is it so hard to extract pennies and dimes to fight poverty in America? We've only had three years at this game—but newspapers yell, politicians scream that war on poverty is one big boondoggle, because we haven't licked the problem overnight. Why this double standard? There are 20 million Americans wallowing in misery, and we've tried to find answers with a paltry $3 billion or so. . . . We think President Johnson will ask for both guns and butter, but he'll hedge on going allout for waging war against domestic enemies of poverty, pollution, and ignorance. . . . There's wave of sympathy for President Johnson, troubled by plummeting polls, war worries, and bad press. But there's also grumbling that many troubles are his own making. What most critics don't realize is Johnson's super-human legislative output. Republicans may growl, as Gerry Ford did last week—but generations yet unborn will be grateful for what Johnson administration did to push America forward. War troubles, creeping inflation, personality quirks tend to make people forget what great things Johnson has done to build Great Society. . . . Conservation people who care about America's diminishing unspoiled outdoors are boiling mad at Internal Revenue Service ruling that Sierra Club will lose its tax exemption. Sierra Club got knee-deep in Grand Canyon controversy, making some slightly far-fetched arguments which got into Washington's bureaucratic craw—but if big government cracks tax whip when private groups like Sierra Club score some points, what can stop those tax bureaucrats from silencing all critics? . . . Washington is sitting on a powder keg that can rock the auto insurance industry. Over $100 million in claims were wiped out by phoney, high risk insurance companies who come and go with the wind making huge profits at expense of auto drivers. It's an $8 billion industry which reaches into political high places, but it's also a juicy political issue waiting for public exposure. Several candidates last year found voters up in arms about auto insurance company shortcomings. It's an issue catching fire. . . . House liberals are in trouble if Texas and Republicans each get additional seat on House Ways and Means Committee. Texas Democrats picked Omer Burleson—14 carat anti-Lyndon Johnson Great Society reactionary—as their man for Ways and Means. New York Democrats with Jake Gilbert had more votes for Democratic vacancy. In a typical clubby-style compromise, House leaders are now talking of adding spot for Democrats and Republicans to make room for Burleson. Thus liberals gain one vote, conservatives gain two—and more Social Security, more liberal foreign trade, federal standards for unemployment insurance may go down drain with Ways and Means Committee already too conservative. . . . House liberals are in better shape as Congress opens this week because they've got seasoned organization: Democratic Study Group. Senate liberals are split four ways to Sunday—but there's fairly good chance they'll get some improvements in Rule 22 which now allows 34 Senators to block legislation. . . . North Dakota's Quentin Burdick is a prairie profile in courage. Burdick gets plenty of credit for starting us toward popular election of Presidents of the United States, dumping electoral college, which nobody likes. Now comes an American Bar Association recommendation (including UAW President Walter Reuther) calling for same thing. Burdick polled nation's state legislators, found big majority favoring direct election of our Presidents.

Affirms Readiness To Debate Issues

AFL-CIO

2/23/67

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council unanimously declared its "complete readiness" to debate and act upon "any complaint, charge, proposal or program novel or ancient" from any affiliate or its officers that comes before it through "appropriate channels" spelled out in the federation's constitution.

"There is no other procedure by which the trade union movement can effectively reach, and carry out, its decisions," the council said in adopting the statement as the first order of business at its mid-winter meeting here.

The resolution emphasized the council's position that it is ready to consider and "act upon any matter at any time, either at this or a future council meeting, at a meeting of the General Board, at a special convention, if necessary, or at the next regular convention." It added:

"We are not, however, prepared to act upon the basis of a kaleidoscope of ever-changing allegations and demands, expressed through press releases, public speeches or circular letters."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany read the text of the council resolution to a crowded press conference and stressed in reply to a series of questions that he will not discuss any charges made by Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther any place except "in the forums of the AFL-CIO." (Text of Statement, Page 2.)

Meany told the press conference that Reuther's resignation from the AFL-CIO Executive Council had been received and that before the current council meeting is over the vacancy will be filled. A subcommittee of the council has been named, in line with standing council practice, to recommend a candidate for the seat.

Next Objectives

The council followed its opening day statement on federation procedures with statements focusing on the campaigns to win higher social security benefits and secure effective enforcement of the expanded minimum wage law for all Americans—union and non-union members alike.

It received also a detailed briefing on Administration programs and policies by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Budget Dir. Charles L. Schultze and White House Assistant Joseph A. Califano, Jr., and voiced its praise for the great record on social legislation achieved by Pres. Johnson and the 89th Congress. (Story this page, text on Page 6.)

The federation will carry directly to the President the question of awarding government contracts to companies which discriminate against workers because of union activities and will ask the President to issue an executive order barring such contract awards where the companies are in violation of federal labor law. (Story this page.)

In a series of statements on domestic policies and legislation the council:

- Voted strong support for a 20 percent increase in social security benefits coupled with extension and improvement of public welfare programs. (Story, Page 3; text, Page 6.)
- Called for increased funds for enforcement of the expanded minimum wage as a "necessary first step" in making a reality of the new amendments to the law. (Story, Page 2.)
- Pledged its "enthusiastic support" for the President's proposals to protect the right of privacy by banning wiretapping and eavesdropping. (Story, Page 3.)
- Urged the adoption of programs to control medical costs in security benefits, the tremendous scope of aid to education programs at all levels, the great jump in programs to combat poverty and assist the poor, the aid for youngsters and the expansion of manpower training programs.

The President's legislative program for the 90th Congress was presented to the Council along with a detailed analysis of the federal budget by White House Assistant Joseph A. Califano, Jr. and Budget Dir. Charles L. Schultze.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany commented at a press conference that the federation has had very good relations with "this Administration." Labor's programs and the social welfare of the nation, he said, have made greater progress and there has been greater cooperation with labor than in any other administration, including that of Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt.

In response to a reporter's query, Meany said that the council statement was not put out as an endorsement of Johnson as a presidential candidate in 1968, but that "personally it's a pretty good reason for an endorsement."

Earlier in the council sessions, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Under Sec. James Reynolds had discussed Labor Dept. programs and policies in a meeting described by both Wirtz and Meany as friendly and constructive.

UAW

Editorial

Come on back, Walter

For as long as there has been a labor movement, union men have known that unity is labor's only source of strength. The greater our unity, the stronger we are—and vice versa.

Thoughtful trade union members greeted the merger of the AFL-CIO almost 12 years ago with satisfaction. Here was proof that the leaders of labor could practice the unity they preach.

Now, labor's unity is being threatened. At the instruction of their Executive Board, leaders of the Auto Workers' Union have resigned their offices in the AFL-CIO. In April, the UAW convention is scheduled to consider pulling the UAW out of the AFL-CIO.

We believe that withdrawal would hurt the UAW and its membership. Years ago—in the 1940's—our union disaffiliated from the old AFL. We have been through that revolving door and we can testify that it doesn't pay. You don't win that way.

Withdrawal of the UAW would also hurt every state federation and every city central body. It would mean that UAW leaders everywhere would be disqualified from speaking, voting, and holding office in state and central bodies.

The IAM has always been proud of its warm and friendly relations with the UAW. We have admired its officers, its aggressive and militant program and its unity. The mutual assistance pact between the IAM and the UAW was the first in the modern labor movement between an AFL union and a CIO union. It has paid many dividends to the membership of both unions.

We were proud last year when IAM President Roy Siemiller had the honor of administering the oath of office to UAW international officers after their re-election at the UAW convention.

Today, we are sorry to say, Walter Reuther's best friends are as uncertain as everyone else about what he hopes to accomplish for the UAW by threatening to go it alone.

The situation is not like that of the 1930's when John L. Lewis led a group, most of them industrial unions, out of the AFL in protest against its domination by the craft unions.

If any principle is involved in the current UAW protest, Mr. Reuther and his fellow officers have failed to make it clear. There are differences, of course, between the president of the UAW and AFL-CIO President George Meany. But to most observes they seem to be differences of degree and of style rather than differences on any basic principle.

The statement adopted last week by the AFL-CIO Executive Council outlines the steps by which the UAW or any other union can try to change AFL-CIO policies when it is dissatisfied. Here in part is what the Executive Council said:

> There is only one limitation upon the extent to which any individual or any organization within the trade union movement can influence the direction of the AFL-CIO, its program and policies or the character and identity of its leadership. As in any democratic order, they must be able to persuade the majority that their complaints are valid, that their proposals are sound and that their alternatives are preferable. Neither size, financial resources, nor extravagance of language can overcome or substitute for that simple basic requirement.
> The officers and members of the Executive Council declare the complete readiness of the AFL-CIO to receive, consider, debate and act upon, any complaint, charge, proposal or program—novel or ancient—that any affiliate or its officers may desire to advance and advocate—if and when properly offered through the appropriate channels of the AFL-CIO Constitution.

We can only hope and pray that the UAW will not split labor's strength. We need every ounce we can muster in the months ahead.

PULLING TOGETHER

Live a Little Longer

Treating apoplexy

By Dr. William A. Sawyer

Apoplexy or stroke is a growing problem. As the population ages, the number of stroke victims increases. Each year stroke kills an estimated 50,000 citizens during their working years. And many more over 65 succumb yearly. Although ranked below heart disease and cancer, many authorities think it would be our number one killer, if accurate figures were known.

What is a stroke? It is a blockage or rupture of a blood vessel in the brain. Deprived of blood supply, brain cells die rather quickly. They are irreplaceable. Paralysis results. A variety of things can interrupt the blood supply to the brain. High blood pressure may rupture a blood vessel. A clot from elsewhere in the body—usually the heart—may be carried to the brain and wedged into a small artery, stopping the flow of blood. At times brain arteries harden and form obstructions within, by developing clots. If blood loss from a ruptured vessel is large and sudden, the victim can be out in seconds and dead in minutes. These are the chief causes of stroke.

Artery obstruction, with resulting pressure on brain cells, in some areas, may give cause paralysis, blindness, speech loss of mental confusion.

One small area of the brain largely governs one arm or one leg. Should the pressure of clot or hemorrhage be exerted in this area, the arm or leg becomes paralyzed. If the affected area is large enough, one whole side of the body becomes paralyzed. This is called hemiplegia. Because of the cross-over of nerves from the brain, the opposite side of the body is paralyzed.

Modern treatment

Up until ten years or so ago, there was relatively little available in the way of treatment. Today with the aid of modern x-ray techniques, and surgery on blood vessels, much can be offered in good medical centers.

Formerly, at least a third or a quarter of stroke cases showed no damage to the brain. This was puzzling until many cases of autopsies were studied and it was found that clots which formed in the large neck blood vessels were responsible for blocking circulation to the brain, thus starving certain brain cells. These clots in the neck blood vessels can now be located by the injection of certain dyes and taking of x-rays (angiography). By surgery they can be removed. From present evidence, one third of all strokes can be attributed to blocked neck vessels.

Successful operation

Dr. De Bakey of Houston tells of a 60-year-old woman, almost completely paralyzed, with such a stroke, who 24 hours after surgery on a neck clot, was walking and talking normally. He has operated on 300 such cases.

Following such surgery it may be necessary to rehabilitate some of the limb muscles which have been weakened or partially paralyzed. Wonders are being accomplished these days through physiotherapy in stroke cases.

The hope for such cases today lies in getting them into medical centers, experienced in handling the results of strokes. Present legislation in Congress is being promoted for the establishing of more well equipped and staffed centers for treating such vital catastrophes. Remind your congressman that you are hopeful for its successful passage and implementation.

Clarifying Statement Regarding Resignations By UAW Officers From AFL-CIO Posts Pursuant to Instruction By IEB

To All Local Unions:

GREETINGS:

The Administrative Letter dated December 28, 1966 which was sent to each UAW Local Union and which clarified problems with regard to the relationship of the UAW with the AFL-CIO noted:

"There is no basic difference between the UAW and the AFL-CIO in the commitment to resist communist aggression and to struggle against all forms of tyranny that would destroy human freedom and enslave the human spirit. We in the UAW can be proud of our record of continuous and successful struggle against communism and all other forms of totalitarianism. We share the view, however, that the most effective way to fight communism is to make democracy work. We believe that anti-communism in and of itself is not enough. We must take positive steps to abolish poverty and hunger and to eliminate social and economic injustice, which are the ingredients that communism exploits and attempts to forge into political power.

"Together with many others in the labor movement, in church, civic, and educational affairs, we have felt that the attitude of the AFL-CIO on most foreign policy questions has been narrow and negative and has not strengthened but rather weakened the free world's efforts to resist communism and all forms of tyranny. We feel that an affirmative, constructive role should be undertaken by the AFL-CIO in matters involving international affairs which will promote and strengthen the efforts of free people in their search to find a basis for building a just and enduring peace.

"While we do disagree on foreign policy matters, it is important to understand that UAW concern and disagreement regarding policies, programs and actions of the AFL-CIO extend far beyond consideration of international affairs and go to the heart of the fulfillment of the fundamental aims and purposes of the American labor movement."

The Administrative Letter further stated:

"The UAW International Executive Board, after serious deliberation and after carefully weighing its responsibilities to UAW members and their families, has concluded that our Union is obligated to speak out on fundamental issues and to express openly our Union's disagreements with the AFL-CIO whenever, in our judgment, the failures or inaction of the AFL-CIO require it."

When in Doubt About International Policy...Contact Your Regional Director

The Administrative Letter stated, moreover, that the UAW International Executive Board would "continue to evaluate and review the work and activities of the AFL-CIO . . ." and "make a further and more detailed report . . ." to all UAW Local Unions.

ACTION TAKEN BY UAW INTERNATIONAL EXECUTIVE BOARD

The UAW International Executive Board met in session January 31-February 3, 1967 and, in the course of its deliberations, further discussed in depth and reviewed carefully the relationship of the UAW with the AFL-CIO.

Acting upon these most careful and serious deliberations, the International Executive Board unanimously concluded that the interests of UAW members and their families and the entire labor movement could best be served by directing the officers of the UAW to resign from the posts which they respectively hold on the AFL-CIO Executive Council, the AFL-CIO General Board and the AFL-CIO Standing Committees.

Notice to this effect was sent to the AFL-CIO in a telegram dated February 3, 1967, copy of which appears on page 12 of this Administrative Letter.

In addition, President Walter P. Reuther was directed to resign from the Board of Directors of the American Institute for Free Labor Development and the African-American Labor Center, both of which are organizations tied closely to the AFL-CIO.

Staff representatives of the UAW assigned to participate in AFL-CIO committee work will continue to do so on a selective basis and as the need requires.

Local Union affiliation with and participation in the work of AFL-CIO subordinate bodies at the state, county and municipal level will continue to be guided by the procedures adopted earlier by the International Executive Board and concerning which all UAW Local Unions were notified in an Administrative Letter dated April 5, 1965.

The International Executive Board further unanimously directed that the official call to the UAW Special Convention, scheduled to be held April 20-22, 1967, shall include as a subject for discussion and Convention action a review of the relationship of the UAW with the AFL-CIO, and granting to the International Executive Board the authorization to take whatever action in this regard will best serve the interests of the UAW, its members and their families, the entire labor movement and the nation as a whole.

These serious steps by the UAW International Executive Board are not taken without carefully weighing the responsibilities which the UAW has to its members and their families, to the American labor movement and to the nation. The UAW is convinced, however, that the current state of the AFL-CIO, its complacency, its indifference, its adherence to the status quo, its lack of social vision, dynamic thrust and crusading spirit, its inability to engage in critical self-analysis, is robbing the labor movement of its opportunity to be the vital, constructive social force that it should and can be.

The UAW's disagreements with the AFL-CIO are basic and fundamental. They relate directly to democratic trade union principles and policies and the development and implementation of sound union programs. They relate to the overall, far reaching question: What should be the essential role of labor's cause in our 20th century technological society and how best can the labor movement fulfill its purposes and its responsibilities to its members, their families and to the whole of society.

From the outset it should be made unmistakably clear that this action by the UAW International Executive Board is taken not in anger, but in sadness; not out of personal pique, but as a matter of conscience; not out of any desire for self-aggrandizement or as a maneuver to gain personal advantage, but as a matter of principle. For the American labor movement, if it is to fulfill its destiny and become the vanguard of social progress, must restore its sense of purpose and direction, instill vitality, imagination and initiative in its programs and their accomplishment and be imbued with the dynamic spirit of social responsibility.

AIMS AND PURPOSES OF A DEMOCRATIC LABOR MOVEMENT

The UAW believes today and has always believed that a free and democratic labor movement in a free society has an obligation to carry out certain basic and essential responsibilities:

- It must work to advance the interests and welfare of its members and their families through the collective bargaining process and through appropriate progressive legislation.
- It must work as a responsible member of the community to help solve the problems of the total community and improve the quality of life for all the people, acting always in the knowledge that labor can make progress only as it shares in the general progress of the entire community and the entire nation.
- It must deploy its unique position as a progressive and advanced social force in cooperation with other progressive community groups to initiate imaginative social invention toward the achievement of creative and constructive social change.
- It must work with the labor movement of the free world to strengthen the forces of freedom and to resist communism and all forms of totalitarianism that would enslave the human spirit.
- It must strive with men and women of good will everywhere to minimize world tension, to fight poverty, human exploitation and social injustice and to build bridges of understanding among peoples and nations to the end that a more rational and responsible world community can emerge in which both peace and freedom can be made secure.
- It must symbolize in its internal structure and procedures the fundamental values of the democratic process to insure that its programs, policies and activities reflect the high moral and social objectives of labor's cause and simultaneously set an example for the nation and people everywhere of the democratic promise in a free society.

AFL-CIO FAILING TO MEET ITS RESPONSIBILITIES

The merger of the AFL and the CIO eleven years ago was born in high hopes of a new thrust, a dynamic forward surge in labor's cause both at home and in the world. The UAW leadership shared the exhilaration of the great promise of a vibrant stirring response to compelling new challenges and to new achievements of progressive thought and progressive action for the labor movement.

The 20th century technological revolution, with its automation, computerization and its fantastic new tools of science and technology, confronts the labor movement and the nation with new and urgent problems, compelling challenges and exciting opportunities. Yet the AFL-CIO, in policy and program, too often continues to live with the past. It advances few new ideas and lacks the necessary vitality, vision, imagination and social invention to make it equal to the challenging problems of a changing world.

It is sad but nevertheless true that the AFL-CIO is becoming increasingly the comfortable, complacent custodian of the status quo.

The continued deterioration of the AFL-CIO is most tragic for there is an urgent need in America for a vital, vibrant, dynamic, socially progressive labor movement. The broad public support that an enlightened and responsible labor movement could inspire would provide important impetus to the creative and constructive forces of social change.

If the drift in the AFL-CIO continues, history will leave it further and further behind and it will be less and less an effective instrument to deal with the problems of our 20th century technological society.

UNDEMOCRATIC ADMINISTRATION OF AFL-CIO PREVENTS MEANINGFUL PARTICIPATION IN ITS DECISION MAKING PROCESS

In the eleven years of merger, the officers of the UAW who have participated in AFL-CIO deliberations on the Executive Council, the General Board or in Standing Committees have seen the great promise of the merger go unfulfilled and have become increasingly disturbed by the inaction, by the indifference, by policies reflecting narrow negativism and by the lack of dynamic and inspired leadership in the AFL-CIO.

A free labor movement needs strong leadership; but there is a fundamental difference between undemocratic, heavy-handed leadership and strong democratic leadership which encourages the democratic process and which demonstrates both the will and the ability to respect dissent and to forge labor unity out of the diversity essential to a free labor movement.

The chief officer of the AFL-CIO has used a heavy hand in discouraging in-depth discussion of basic policy issues and the objective evaluation of new ideas and new concepts. He has failed or he has refused to display a willingness to share democratic leadership responsibility in the formulation of policies and programs for the AFL-CIO, and their effective implementation.

A free labor movement must be the instrument of its members and must reflect their hopes and aspirations and must be able to translate their needs and their will into effective policy and program. Its decisions must draw upon the full play of the democratic processes and arise from the substance and splendor of human diversity. A democratic labor movement cannot be used as though it were the private and personal property of one person.

Over the years repeated efforts have been made to get the AFL-CIO off dead center and to accept new ideas and new concepts to meet new problems and new challenges. Even when such efforts were successful, however, and were carried by a democratic majority vote, the actions taken have not always been carried out. Basic provisions of the Constitution of the AFL-CIO have been violated; on occasion even the almost unanimous mandate of the AFL-CIO Convention itself has been thwarted, if the constitutional provision or the Convention mandate did not meet with the personal pleasure of the president of the AFL-CIO.

As the UAW officers pointed out in the Administrative Letter of December 28, 1966, the AFL-CIO Constitution has been violated by the failure to establish the Executive Committee of the AFL-CIO as required by the Constitution.

A glaring example of failure or refusal to carry out the democratic mandate of an AFL-CIO Convention decision was the failure by the chief officer of the AFL-CIO to support efforts to implement the San Francisco Convention mandate in 1959 to establish an internal disputes mechanism by setting up an orderly procedure to stop destructive raiding among AFL-CIO affiliates, which was pitting labor union against labor union and dissipating their resources and good will. Prior to the San Francisco Convention of 1959, a sub-committee of the AFL-CIO Executive Council was established to make recommendations for effective internal disputes machinery. This sub-committee, chaired by A. J. Hayes, then president of the IAM, met, deliberated at length and submitted specific proposals to the Executive Council, which unanimously approved them and which subsequently were approved at the 1959 San Francisco Convention with only one affiliate, the International Typographical Union, opposed. The efforts of the sub-committee, the decision by the Executive Council to accept its recommendations and even the Convention mandate itself were blocked and not carried out by the chief officer of the AFL-CIO.

Two years later, at the next AFL-CIO Convention in Miami, in 1961, the earlier Convention mandate had still not been carried out because of opposition by the president of the AFL-CIO to the recommendations which had been made. This failure by the president of the AFL-CIO to cooperate in implementing the San Francisco Convention mandate created a grave crisis within the AFL-CIO. This crisis was finally resolved at the Miami Convention in 1961 only by reason of the pressure brought by the industrial unions in the AFL-CIO insisting that the chief officer of the AFL-CIO withdraw his resistance to the San Francisco Convention mandate and permit it to be carried out. Only after long, arduous and at times bitter wrangling was the internal disputes machinery finally worked out at the Miami Convention and incorporated in the AFL-CIO Constitution as Article XXI.

UAW WILL PRESENT ITS RECOMMENDATIONS ON BROAD POLICY ISSUES TO THE ENTIRE LABOR MOVEMENT

In this undemocratic climate, in which democratically arrived at decisions are ignored or thwarted, Convention mandates are not carried out, constitutional provisions are violated, and in which new ideas and new concepts are rejected and dissent and diversity are not tolerated, it is not possible to share in democratic leadership responsibility, which is essential if the AFL-CIO Executive Council, the AFL-CIO General Board and the AFL-CIO Standing Committees are to function properly and make their constructive contribution to the American labor movement.

Under these circumstances, continuation of membership in these bodies is merely an exercise in futility and we cannot in good conscience continue to serve.

The UAW International Executive Board therefore determined that UAW officers should not be saddled with the restrictions and obligations associated with participation in the Executive Council, the General Board or the Standing Committees of the AFL-CIO. Rather, the UAW will express its views and promote its ideas and proposed programs and policies within the broader arena of the total labor movement.

These fundamental differences over program and policy are not private matters that can best be discussed in the narrow, exclusive and limited circle of the AFL-CIO Executive Council or any other limited body of the AFL-CIO. Matters of basic policy and program of the American labor movement affect every wage earner and the public at large and they have a right to know what the policy and programmatic differences in the labor movement are so they can help influence the ultimate decisions and determinations.

It is for this reason that the UAW International Executive Board has determined to issue a series of program and policy recommendations to stimulate and encourage a discussion of these matters within the overall labor movement and the public at large.

The UAW decision to have its officers resign from their posts in the AFL-CIO does not mean that the UAW is running away from a fight. To run away from a fight on program, policy and principle would be incompatible with the whole history and tradition of the UAW. We are choosing rather to make the fight for sound programs, policies and principles in the broad arena of the whole labor movement and not within the narrow, private and exclusive top structure of the AFL-CIO.

OUTLINE OF UAW PROGRAM FOR THE AMERICAN LABOR MOVEMENT

In the weeks ahead the UAW will be advancing recommended programs and policies for consideration by the American labor movement which we believe are essential to get the American labor movement off dead center and on the march and to make it equal to the complex and challenging problems we face in a 20th century technological society. The recommendations will cover the following basic areas in which the American labor movement must share responsibility and play a decisive role:

I. Internal Reform and Democratization of the AFL-CIO

This will include proposals to:

A. Broaden the Executive Council of the AFL-CIO to make it more representative and instill new ideas, new vision and new vitality;

B. Establish the Executive Committee as required by the Constitution and make it a meaningful, functioning committee;

C. Provide the General Board the opportunity to share fully in leadership responsibility in shaping major program and policy decisions and in insuring their effective implementation;

D. Strengthen the work and responsibility of Standing Committees to enable them to make their maximum constructive contribution to the labor movement;

E. Establish a Public Review Board in the AFL-CIO modeled after the UAW Public Review Board and charged with the responsibility to enforce the AFL-CIO Ethical Practices Code and to defend the democratic rights of members.

F. Strengthen the state and local federations and councils by constitutional provisions that will insure that the local unions, chapters or lodges of AFL-CIO affiliates will assume their proportionate share of the cost to perform the essential functions of state and local bodies of the AFL-CIO.

II. A Massive Comprehensive, Coordinated, Cooperative Organizing Crusade

A. To organize the millions of unorganized industrial, construction trades, retail and distribution, office, technical, professional, federal government, state and municipal workers, school teachers, etc. to enable them to share the benefits and protection of organization;

B. To organize the millions of agricultural workers and working poor in our cities and rural areas to enable them to achieve the status of first class economic citizens in our free society.

III. Strengthening and Modernizing Collective Bargaining Machinery

This will include:

A. The development of a sound overall economic wage policy to achieve equity for all American wage earners on a basis consistent with the overall needs of society and the realities of our evolving technology;

B. The creation within the AFL-CIO of the appropriate structure and provision of necessary resources and personnel to:

- achieve maximum cooperation and coordination between affiliates with respect to their collective bargaining responsibilities, including the establishment of a computerized data center modeled after the IUD Data Center to provide up-to-date collective bargaining information to all affiliates;

- establish and administer a United Defense Fund to provide adequate support for workers under circumstances in which the employer is engaged in an effort to destroy their union or is unwilling to bargain in good faith;

- develop and implement a positive and constructive program to enable workers in critical and vital public service industries to achieve equity comparable with other workers under circumstances in which workers in these industries will not be forced to resort to strike action that endangers the health and safety of the public.

IV. Labor's Role and Responsibility in the Community

This will include:

A. The development of programs and policies for labor to play its rightful role and meet its responsibilities in the task of rebuilding our cities and rural areas and making low-cost, high quality housing available through the use of the new tools of science and technology in creating a wholesome living environment worthy of free men;

B. Providing educational opportunities to facilitate maximum growth and development of America's children and youth;

C. Assuring a fuller measure of security and dignity for America's older citizens;

D. Removing for all the American people the economic barriers to access to high quality comprehensive medical and health care;

E. Demonstrating greater courage and compassion in extending equal rights and equal opportunity to every American not only at the community level and through legislation, but, of major importance, within the labor movement itself;

F. Working with government and private groups in developing economic programs and policies to achieve maximum economic growth and expansion of our national economy, to the end that every American able and willing to work may be assured the opportunity of a socially useful and rewarding job;

G. Providing affirmative and constructive leadership and adequate resources necessary to assume full partnership with other groups in the community working to supplement government programs in an all out crusade to abolish human poverty in this land of plenty;

H. Assuring a more active role at the federal, state and local level in cooperation with other citizen groups to promote needed programs to conserve and develop our natural resources, to eliminate pollution of air and water and to beautify and improve our living environment;

I. Sponsoring joint conferences and seminars with the liberal intellectual and academic community and with youth groups in order to build and strengthen the historic alliance with those who can and will be labor's natural allies in the broad effort to advance the common good.

V. American Labor's Relationship With and Responsibility Toward Strengthening the Free World Labor Movement

- By building understanding and cooperation in the common effort to extend the frontiers of economic and social justice and the achievement of human dignity and freedom in the world.

VI. The Role and Responsibility of American Labor in a Changing World

- To defend and extend freedom;
- To resist communism and all forms of totalitarianism that would enslave the human spirit;
- To reduce world tension by building bridges of international understanding leading toward a reduction in armaments and the building of a just and enduring peace in which people with diverse economic and social systems might live peacefully in a more rational and responsible world community.

UAW DISSENT CONCERNS PROGRAMS, POLICIES AND PRINCIPLES

There are others in the labor movement who, though sharing our sense of dissatisfaction and deep concern that the labor movement is vegetating, has lost its drive, its sense of purpose, its sense of social idealism, nevertheless, are hesitant to speak out because they feel that to express disagreement publicly is to be accused of rocking the boat of labor unity. While respecting their right to this view, the UAW believes that, in the face of the continued failures and growing complacency and inaction of the AFL-CIO, we are obligated to take our stand. Our position, however, is not one of negative criticism. We advocate positive alternatives.

Labor unity built upon a monolithic relationship can only be unity in form, not unity in substance. Unity in substance is possible only when the programs and policies of a free labor movement are the end product of free and open debate out of which diversity can be harmonized into a meaningful common denominator for joint action.

The UAW International Executive Board is fully conscious of the fact that its recent action is unprecedented in the history of the American labor movement. At no time have members of the Executive Council resigned over matters of principle, program and policy. Earlier resignations, when they occurred, resulted primarily from disputes over jurisdictional claims. In the light of this historic background, it is understandable that the press and others are trying to figure out (and there will undoubtedly be numerous "dope stories" about it) the UAW's moves and motivations. There will be "dope stories" about power drives, personality clashes, internal political maneuvering, etc.

UAW members may be assured that the leaders of their Union are not engaged in political maneuvers or power drives or personality contests, nor are they motivated by personal considerations.

As time will tell, we are making this fight as a matter of principle, of program and policy. When the merger of the AFL-CIO took place in December, 1955, the leadership of the national CIO, of which Walter P. Reuther was president, took the position, in the discussions with the leadership of the AFL, that the CIO was not concerned with nor interested in matters of personal position, personal power or prestige. The CIO leaders indicated clearly, at that time and since, that they were concerned primarily with matters of principle, program and policy. They did not seek any of the executive offices in the merged labor movement. Both the presidency and secretary-treasurership went to representatives of the AFL.

The current dispute is likewise not a matter of personalities, power or position; we repeat, it is a matter of principles, policies and programs as they relate to the role and responsibility of a modern labor movement.

The UAW and its leadership have many close friends in the leadership of many of the AFL-CIO affiliates, who are dedicated and committed trade unionists. We have chosen not to involve them in this present effort because, to have done so, would have opened us to the charge that we were building a power caucus within the AFL-CIO and that this is not a principled fight, but a political power drive. The UAW leadership is sufficiently sophisticated to know that if a political power drive is contemplated it is essential to build a coalition of allies. Since we are not engaged in a power drive, we have taken no steps to create a caucus of allies and we have no intention of doing so in the future.

We intend to take our stand, and what others do is a matter of their conscience and their judgment based on their individual evaluation as to whether the AFL-CIO is truly fulfilling its purposes and meeting its responsibilities or falling far short of its goals.

UAW PROMISES TO PLAY A CONSTRUCTIVE ROLE IN MOVING THE LABOR MOVEMENT FORWARD

Measured against the background of the past eleven years, we in the UAW believe that the AFL-CIO has failed the bright promise of the merger. Only as the AFL-CIO demonstrates the will and the commitment to free itself from inertia and complacency and to adopt and implement programs which will reflect renewed vigor, new direction and a fresh sense of purpose, can the AFL-CIO meet its obligations to its members and their families, to the nation and to the world.

The UAW played a major role in bringing the merger of the AFL and the CIO into being because it held the strong conviction that the merged labor movement could provide the inspiring opportunity for a unified labor movement to fulfill the historic social objectives which lie at the heart of labor's cause.

The UAW and its representatives have worked conscientiously and consistently over the years to help achieve the noble objectives for which the merger was created. It has given unstintingly of its manpower, its resources, its time and effort in this cause. Time and time again, the UAW proposed policies and programs designed to move the labor movement forward along an enlightened path of social and trade union accomplishment. These efforts, however, were smothered by the complacency, indifference and undemocratic administration in the top structure of the AFL-CIO. The UAW International Executive Board therefore has made the historic decision to fight for these principles, programs and policies in the broad arena of the whole labor movement.

In the past the UAW has made it a cardinal principle to cooperate to the fullest extent possible in all significant, meaningful, progressive activities and undertakings of the labor movement. Its commitment to labor's cause and the cause of social justice remains as firm today, and the UAW will continue to offer cooperation and assistance in partnership with all unions and with individuals and groups within and without the labor movement whose dedication and purpose are consonant with these aims and objectives.

As the UAW leadership completes the details of its program and policy recommendations they will be submitted to all UAW Local Unions and will be submitted for discussion and action at the UAW Special Convention scheduled April 20-22, 1967.

With all good wishes.

Walter Reuther in 1955: 'George, this is the beginning. You will lead the American labor movement to higher and higher and higher levels of achievement.'

Walter Reuther in 1967: 'The failure of AFL-CIO to fulfill its promise [to be] a dynamic and effective instrument for . . . social change is a cause for grave concern.'

Reuther walks out—but doesn't shut the door

Reuther-Meany estrangement is widened by UAW resignations from AFL-CIO posts, but insiders expect that labor unity will survive

Firm stance is par for George Meany.

Over the next few months, "marriage counselors" from the Johnson Administration and organized labor will be busy trying to save the 12-year-old AFL-CIO partnership.

At this point, there is only a sort of separation: The United Auto Workers, the largest, richest, and most influential union in AFL-CIO, has taken the first steps of separation, but there has been no formal talk of a divorce. The betting inside labor is that there won't be one.

But the fear remains that a bad situation could become intolerably worse—shattering labor unity and replacing it with feuding and fighting.

A week ago, the United Auto Workers executive board "unanimously directed" the union's four top officers to resign from the AFL-CIO executive council, general board, and standing committees. The board said the action was considered in "the best interests of UAW members and their families and the entire labor movement."

Resignations. The order, on the recommendation of UAW President Walter Reuther, resulted in Reuther's resignation as an AFL-CIO vice-president, member of the federation's six-man executive board, member of its 29-man executive council, and chairman of its economic policy and organization committees. UAW Secretary-Treasurer Emil Mazey and Vice-Presidents Leonard Woodcock and Pat Greathouse also quit AFL-CIO posts.

The four officers had joined earlier in a strong statement that criticized AFL-CIO's "failures" and that affirmed their "obligation to speak out on fundamental issues and to express openly our union's disagreements with the AFL-CIO."

Significantly, the board action did not apply to positions held or activities conducted through the AFL-CIO's Industrial Union Dept., a 29-union body that has former CIO unions as its core.

Jolting. The withdrawals from federation jobs came as a surprise to most at Solidarity House, the auto union's headquarters in Detroit, and it jolted AFL-CIO. However, the action itself was less a surprise than its timing: It came much sooner than expected.

A short time before the announcement, a top UAW officer, briefing union staff people in Pennsylvania on relations with AFL-CIO, said only that it had been decided that Reuther should "speak out on UAW's views about domestic and international policies, regardless of AFL-CIO's position." The staff people applauded the decision. They left the meeting, one said, without an inkling that in less than two weeks UAW's future affiliation with AFL-CIO would be in question.

When the news came out in Solidarity House, there was shock. It was recognized as a Reuther-inspired step—and not to be questioned. Nobody except a few close, trusted aides ever really knows what Reuther really has in mind or why he does what he does. To many associates, he is a somewhat mysterious figure who keeps his own counsel; there is a feeling that he always follows some majestic grand strategy—that there is much more in what he is doing than meets the eye.

Pondering. In this instance, there is widespread speculation that Reuther may be planning to lead UAW out of AFL-CIO, either at a special bargaining convention in April or by the end of the year if the federation doesn't shift to policies along the lines Reuther proposes.

At this time, a walkout hardly appears likely. Reuther's strategy often isn't as majestic or grand as it's supposed to be. It can be simple: Reuther may only feel that when a man is a member of a group operating under majority rules, he ought to abide by the rules. By the wholesale resignations, UAW's top officers can be free to speak critically from a strong minority position.

When Reuther has in the past taken AFL-CIO to task for what he considers its failures and record of inaction, his arch-foe George Meany, powerful president of the federation, has chided him for not confining his disagreements over policy matters to the privacy of the council room. If Reuther is outside the council, he'll no longer be in the closed sessions of the men who formulate AFL-CIO's between-conventions policies.

Influential dissenter. Outside the council, Reuther is likely to be, if anything, more influential—as a dissenter who represents one-tenth of AFL-CIO members, about 1.4-million of a total 13.5-million, and as a constant threat to the AFL-CIO establishment.

Most of the talk of UAW quitting AFL-CIO comes from outside labor. Officially, the auto union isn't doing anything to discourage it—and isn't likely to. It gains bargaining power with the federation leadership as long as the talk persists.

UAW lower-echelon people don't expect secession. They say there's been no preliminary talk of it. But, more importantly, they point out that Reuther needs IUD as a forum to give his wide-ranging views a broader perspective. They also note that UAW holds—and finds useful —influential posts in many state, county, and city central labor bodies (alliances of AFL-CIO unions) that it would have to quit at a cost of power and prestige if it left AFL-CIO. Finally, they point out that UAW can't stand alone and do the kind of social reform work it considers vital.

Lower level agreement. Officers of other AFL-CIO unions don't expect UAW to walk out: They say that basically the dispute isn't as much between AFL-CIO and UAW as between Meany and Reuther. Below the executive level, the schism is felt little nationally and almost not at all in regional and local relationships. Still, if chips go down in a Meany-Reuther contest, Reuther could get secession approval by asking for it.

Major concerns. Such a possibility worries top leaders of the federation who will be gathering in Florida a week from now for AFL-CIO's suddenly critical midwinter executive council meeting. And it's what worries the Johnson Administration, too. The possibility that an incident could lead to a secession action now weighs heavily in many minds. For labor, the carefully nurtured unity of 1955 is in jeopardy, and bitter internecine fighting similar to that of the old AFL and CIO days could flare up once more. For the Administration, the threat is of unsettling labor wars—harmful to the economy—and another political uncertainty for the Democrats in 1968.

The result will be the marriage-counseling efforts by labor middle-of-the-roaders and by the Administration. Meany and Reuther can expect what has come to be known as the "jawbone treatment" in Washington—persuasive discussions about the need to reconcile at least the most pressing of their differences in the interests of the labor movement and the Great Society.

Unpalatable potato. Some close to both Meany and Reuther suggest that this is actually what Reuther hopes to achieve—that what he has actually done is to throw a hot potato to Meany and that it's now up to Meany to hold onto it—for compromises—or drop it.

The crisis time for unity is likely to be next December—when AFL-CIO's biennial convention is scheduled, and when Reuther can move dramatically for changes in AFL-CIO policy directions—if necessary—with an implied threat of secession.

Most of the men in the top offices of AFL-CIO affiliates hope it won't come to that then—or ever. End

SEMANTIC STEW: A CRABWISE MINI-SLUMP?

Recessions—like failing marriages, decaying empires and other unpleasant things—are always labeled in retrospect. While they are actually happening, most people look for softer words to describe what is going on. The result is a semantic stew of euphemisms: "rolling readjustment," "high-level stagnation," "crabwise movement" or just plain "dip."

Last week, economists in and out of government were using all these phrases, and groping for more, to describe the current slowdown in the U.S. economy. What prompted the dialogue was the fact that eleven of the twelve foremost "leading indicators" of business activity (including the average workweek, the layoff rate and the pace of manufacturers' orders) have been trending downward for months, and the index of industrial production showed an outright drop of a full percentage point last month after a six-month leveling trend. Yet most experts were inclined to be cautious, for in the past the leading indicators have sometimes turned sour only to herald a one- or two-month "pause."

Has a full-scale recession actually begun? Officially, at least, the Johnson Administration is still hewing to the line that chief economic adviser Gardner Ackley set out last December: "Recession is the least of our worries." The Council of Economic Advisers conceded that the first half of 1967 looked "soft," but predicted an upsurge after midyear strong enough to require the dampening effects of the President's proposed 6 per cent tax surcharge.

Nongovernment economists offered all shades of opinion. Last week Pierre Rinfret, head of the economic consulting firm of Rinfret-Boston Associates Inc., boldly maintained that "the recession has begun." But New York's First National City Bank spoke only of "a continuing slowdown," while the Chase Manhattan Bank letter called it "a period of basic readjustment."

The Key: If it persists, the slump in industrial output will be the key indicator; the commonly accepted definition of a recession requires a drop in the production index for at least six months. And the pessimists see little chance that production will turn up again soon. Orders for new goods are tailing off, and inventories have ballooned in recent months.

Against this, the optimists foresee a new surge in demand for goods as the Federal Reserve Board's easy-money policy works through the economy in the next few months and continuing Vietnam spending pumps money into it.

But no one can be sure—and meanwhile, the semantic problem continues. Bank of America president Rudolph Peterson sees "traces of schizophrenia" in the economy. Secretary of the Treasury Henry H. Fowler discerns "substantial moderation." Fed chairman William McChesney Martin calls it a process of "orderly corrective adjustments." And in what may well be this year's definitive euphemism, a chart-watcher at the Commerce Department says: "You can't call this a recession yet. It's more like a mini-slump."

"I suggest," said a top economist at the Office of Business Economics last week, "that we all wait until the warm weather comes before we make precise judgments." That is undoubtedly good advice—and when that time comes, whatever it is will hopefully be over and done with. Then, perhaps, it can be called by its rightful name.

■ Whatever the state of the economy, a solid two-thirds of the U.S. public want no part of the President's proposed 6 per cent income-tax surcharge. A Louis Harris survey this week shows 65 per cent opposed, only 24 per cent in favor and 11 per cent undecided—a striking change from a year ago, when 44 per cent of those surveyed thought a tax rise was necessary to fight inflation and only 49 per cent opposed such a move.

LABOR:

Who's Angry?

As members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council gathered for their annual winter meeting at Miami Beach early last week, the betting was that tough ol' George Meany might outdo the hot Florida sun in tanning hides. For one thing, United Auto Workers president Walter Reuther had just resigned from the council with a bitter blast at Meany's conservative and "undemocratic" rule—and the outspoken AFL-CIO president had yet to reply. But perhaps more important, this is the time of year when the 13.5 million-member federation traditionally takes its stand on government economic policy—and Meany up until now has been a blunt and unrelenting critic of the Johnson Administration's wage guidelines.

Soft Answer: But George Meany turned out to be an old softy. Supported unanimously by 26 other members of the Executive Council, he read an uncommonly gentle reply to Reuther, pointing out only that if the UAW president had any complaints about the way the AFL-CIO is run, he could always bring them to the Executive Council. Meany also let it be known that Reuther can return to the council if he wants, and quickly answered "yes" when a reporter asked if he'd like Reuther back. Said Meany: "I'm for labor unity."

Yet Meany's calm handling of l'affaire Reuther was only a prelude to an even bigger surprise: a week-long love feast between the AFL-CIO and the Johnson Administration. At last winter's council meeting, Meany was so angry at the Administration's insistence that labor curb its wage demands that he threatened to break with the Democratic Party. But this year, courted by an unprecedented array of Administration persuaders, the 72-year-old Meany and the labor council he controls talked as if the Democrats could do no wrong.

The persuaders were led by Labor Secretary W. Willard Wirtz, Treasury Secretary Henry Fowler, Presidential Assistant Joseph Califano and Budget Director Charles Schultze (Vice President Hubert Humphrey was scheduled to wind up the courtship this week). And while the Administration ambassadors had little of economy-shaking significance to bring to Miami Beach, their courtesy calls did bolster the fresh spirit of cooperation between the White House and the AFL-CIO.

To AFL-CIO insiders, that spirit dates from a long letter Meany sent to the President shortly before Mr. Johnson delivered his State of the Union Message in January. In the letter, Meany said that labor wanted Mr. Johnson to continue with the basic Great Society programs and—most important—would join in supporting "any sacrifices" needed to finance them along with the war in Vietnam. President Johnson promptly called Meany to the White House, where the two talked candidly one evening about Administration-AFL-CIO relations. Since then, one key AFL-CIO staffer said, there has been a series of meetings at the White House level dealing with the economy, election strategy and techniques for pushing Great Society legislation on Capitol Hill.

Outlook Sunny: With that kind of background, it was hardly surprising that last week's mood at Miami Beach was as sunny as the weather. "This is probably a historic event," exulted Henry Fowler, referring to the fact that rarely—if ever—had a Treasury Secretary called on labor's ruling council. Labor Secretary Wirtz was equally ebullient as he thanked labor for "helping to achieve the fulfillment of the liberal program in America." For his part, Meany got so carried away that he called the work of the President and the Democratic-controlled 89th Congress "a record unsurpassed in any period of democratic government." It came almost as an anticlimax when he endorsed Lyndon Johnson for re-election next year.

Such expressions of mutual affection, of course, masked the fact that the Administration representatives and AFL-CIO leaders simply didn't talk about subjects that might have sent everyone away mad—chiefly the White House's continuing desire for wage restraint. Plainly, the Administration did not want to rile labor in a year when union leaders will be negotiating contracts covering 7 million workers. At the same time, with the Presidential campaign just a year away, it was anxious to begin rallying labor's support for the Democratic column.

But inside the AFL-CIO, the new rapport—and the impressive list of guests from Washington—emphasized another fact: the Johnson Administration recognizes George Meany, for all his troubles with Walter Reuther, as the unchallenged leader of the AFL-CIO.

So it was that George Meany had a wholly satisfying week. In high good spirits, he padded around the Americana Hotel pool without the cane he has long used, managed a few games of gin rummy with old cronies, shot a 91 on the golf course and even went dancing one night with his daughter, Genevieve—"the first time I've tried that in many, many years." As one observer from Reuther's hometown of Detroit summed up: "Walter Reuther is getting no younger and George Meany is getting no older."

Chapin and Rambler: Back to the days of Romney

AUTOS:

The 69-Cent Special

Detroit's auto moguls tend to shudder at the mere thought of flat-out price competition. Not only does it eat into profits and condition the customer to look for bargains instead of luxurious optional extras; it is all too often the last gasp of a dying company. "Remember," says one Detroiter, "all those billboards offering Packards for $2,224?"

Despite this ominous precedent, the ailing American Motors Corp. last week announced the sharpest auto price cut in years—a drop of $154 to $234 in retail list prices of its bottom-of-the-line American models. And for all their skepticism, rival executives conceded that the move could well be a shrewd moneymaker.

The cuts bring the lowest-priced Rambler American down to $1,839, about $280 below its six-cylinder competition from Falcon, Valiant and Corvair. More important, the American now sells for only $200 more than the fast-moving Volkswagen—and AMC chairman Roy D. Chapin Jr. made it plain that VW and fellow imports were AMC's real targets. In fact, the company will copy VW—and offset the price cuts—by abandoning yearly restyling of the American.

There is no doubt that imported cars are a tempting target in today's auto market. While sales of domestic autos have been in a prolonged slump (most recent ten-day sales off 21 per cent), the imports continue to match their record pace of 660,000 cars sold last year.

Chapin punched home the lesson at a news conference featuring a comparison of the American and the VW. After the price cuts, he said, the six-passenger American will cost only $306 per passenger seat, compared with $409 per seat for the four-passenger import. And in price per pound, Chapin said, the American is a steal: 69 cents vs. 90 cents.

Healthy Gain: AMC's Detroit rivals showed no sign of matching the price cuts but they were clearly intrigued by the strategy. "Who's to say they can't get 140,000 out of the market?" said one Big Three executive. That would be a healthy gain for AMC, which sold only 78,000 Americans last year.

Plainly, AMC was returning to the strategy of Michigan Gov. George Romney, who led the company to prosperity with a sales pitch focused on economy and durability. "I happen to feel strongly that we should pick areas where we can do something unique," Chapin said. "If that harks back to George Romney, I can't deny that . . . We had to do something that would sort of stir things up."

His association with UAW goes back to 1941 when he joined Local 50 at the Willow Run, Mich. bomber plant. He was president of the local when he was appointed to the first of a series of posts in the International Union which included those of co-ordinator of organization and Education Dept. director.

In addition to his labor activities, Sexton has earned wide recognition in the educational world.

He and his wife, Dr. Patricia Cayo Sexton, a member of the graduate school faculty at New York University, have taught at NYU a special course entitled "Labor and Society." Mrs. Sexton previously served on the faculty of Wayne State University and is the author of four books, including Education and

WASHINGTON REPORT

Vol. 8, No. 51 December 9, 1968

United Automobile, Aerospace, and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW

THESE BIG POPULATION CORRIDORS will soon be bursting with people trying to get from place to place. New fast trains like the Washington-New York-Boston train (built by UAW members for the Washington to New York run) will cut down travel time, ease a lot of frazzled nerves, and make automobile driving a pleasure instead of a chore once again. The new trains (upper left) whiz by in test runs and will soon be operating in the most densely populated section of the nation. Ultimately, the same concept in transportatoin will extend to the rest of the country.

New fast trains will revolutionize travel between population areas

By LEO SOLOMON

A year behind schedule, January should see the start of fast train service in the northeast corridor, extending from Washington through New York to Boston.

The cars are ready for the New York to Boston part of the trial service. They will consist of two trains of three cars each.

Over half of the 50 metroliners—self-propelled electric cars for New York to Washington runs—have been delivered. The electrical bugs that held up final acceptance of the 20 day coaches have been eliminated. All of them should be ready for service at the start of 1969.

The electrical trouble was not as great as had been anticipated. In part a good deal of the delay on these cars was caused by a dispute, between the Budd Company, which built all the metroliners, and Westinghouse the subcontractor for the electrical equipment in the 20 coaches, as to who was at fault. That has been resolved and the coaches are being delivered to Penn Central ready to go into service.

Two very different types of equipment will be used. Because, unlike the fully electrified Penn-Central between Washington and New York, less than one-third of the New Haven road between New York and Boston is electrified, gas fuel, not electricity, will be used to propel the turbo trains. They embody aero-dynamic principles and were described in detail in a previous issue of UAW Washington Report.

Each 3-car turbo train will have some electrical propulsion to provide for operation in the tunnel under Park Avenue, New York, into Grand Central Station.

All 50 metroliner cars were built by the Budd Company. General Electric installed the electrical equipment in the 20 snack coaches and the 10 parlor cars. These have already been delivered and accepted. Westinghouse provided the electrical equipment for the 20 coaches which are now being delivered.

Penn Central may use more of these cars before the formal start of the experimental service, but the U.S. Department of Transportation will not sign the contract for the 2-year demonstration until 28 of the 50 cars—with at least 80% coaches—have been accepted.

The hold-up delaying the start of the New York-Boston fast service is financial not mechanical. The Department of Transportation is holding off on signing a contract with the New Haven until a final decision is reached on the inclusion of the New York, New Haven and Hartford into the Penn Central. Naturally, it will not offer the same financial inducements to the prosperous Penn Central that it would have given to a railroad on the verge of bankruptcy.

Initially the metroliners will cover the 226 miles between New York and Washington in 3 hours flat. That is 35 minutes better than the best time—Congressional Limited—now. Ultimately, it is hoped that another half-hour can be lopped off the running time to make the regular scheduled time 2½ hours. There will be proportional time savings for the intermediate stops at Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore. Newark, N.J., will be eliminated as a station stop for the metroliners. Instead these trains will use a new station to be built at Woodbridge, N.J., where the rail line crosses the Garden State Parkway. And a station will be added for Virginia and Maryland suburbanites in Maryland where the railroad croses I-495, the Washington beltway.

The turbotrains will save a full hour for New York to Boston passengers, making the run in 3 hours, 15 minutes, instead of 4 hours, 15 minutes.

CANADIANS DO IT BETTER—This sleek new turbo train will whisk you from Toronto to Montreal in four hours. It's an example of how modern technology can serve the transportation needs of people on the ground, instead of catering to the whims of a few luxury air passengers who are the beneficiaries of much goverment assistance.

Once the new fast service starts it will take a lot of hard selling to woo passengers back to the railroad. A hopeful sign is that in a recent statement, senior vice president Robert W. Minor, of the Penn Central, spoke of "customers" instead of "passengers." From the way railroads have been getting rid of passenger trains it has seemed that the only customers in their lexicon were freight shippers.

Another hopeful sign is that Penn Central is putting about $50 million of its own money into the experimental service. That has gone and is going for improving the roadbed, adding continuous rail, eliminating grade crossings, building new car level platforms at Washington, Baltimore and Wilmington, plus 2 new stations at beltway intersection and retraining personnel for the operation of the new service.

There should be a good market for frequent, fast passenger trains in the northeast corridor. For one or two persons it may prove not only faster, but cheaper than door to door by private automobile. The new stops at beltways will make for convenience and time saving. Frequent service may overcome the reluctance to adjust departures to time tables. Low prices (fares), courteous service, good, low cost meals and consistent on-time arrivals and departures should all help.

Though nation-wide the railroads are still discarding passenger trains, the northeast corridor experiment would indicate that some railroad managers are not as short sighted and certainly not as mercenary as those described by Peter Lyon in his lively and well documented "TO HELL IN A DAY COACH," (J.B. Lippincott, $5.95). He blames management, past and present, for the sorry state of U.S. railroads.

Lyon indicts the robber barons who built, put together and operated the first railroad systems for greed, corruption of legislators and outright thievery. He accuses their successors of stupidity and of being more concerned with carrying out stock manipulations for and with their banker backers than with operating a sound transportation system.

Though railroad management wails about competition from trucks, inland waterways, airplanes, the high cost of labor, taxes and government regulation, Lyon insists that loss of railroad traffic is their own fault.

He devotes pages to labor's early struggles for a decent wage, citing especially Eugene V. Debs' leadership of his brotherhood and later of the American Railway Union. The early rail magnates practised wage cutting at every opportunity and for years succesfully fought establishment of strong unions.

Lyon insists that, though hauling freight is wholesale business and more profitable than passenger service, which is essentially retailing, carrying passengers did not produce the enormous losses management claims.

According to Lyon the passenger loss is minimal, if indeed, there is any loss at all. Antiquated bookkeeping, established in 1887 by the Interstate Commerce Commission, is still used, though even the railroads admit it does not convey a true picture of the breakdown between freight and passenger costs.

He cites examples of railroad efforts to get rid of passengers. Then, they turn around and blame buses, airplanes and private cars for the loss of passengers. There have been some exceptions to this effort to lose passengers, principally in the far west and along the Atlantic seaboard where passenger service from the northeast to Florida is still going strong.

And across our northern border, The Canadian National Railway with fast, clean, comfortable trains and lowered fares has regained passengers from the airline.

Let's hope it is not too late for our railroads to regain the passengers they have driven away. The northeast corridor project indicates, some, at least, have had a change of heart.

There are many reasons the corridor experiment should succeed. A return of any considerable portion of the travelling public to the railroads would ease congestion on the highways and in the airlanes. Putting stations at beltways should prove a convenience and a time saver, especially for suburbanites. Convenient low cost parking at such spots may make the trip faster, more comfortable and cheaper than all the way by private automobile.

Compared to the huge amounts, billions of dollars, the United States has spent and is spending to subsidize building mammoth passenger airplanes, the $11¼ million appropriated for the Penn-Central part of the corridor experiment is a bargain. Millions living in the corridor should benefit, while only the comparative few who fly the oceans will benefit directly from the projected supersonic planes carrying several hundred in a few hours across the Atlantic.

Faster trains are a small part of a whole new system of transportation which we'll need to move around efficiently with a mushroming population in the years and decades ahead.

WEEKEND WRAPUP

Strom Thurmond has his pipeline to Nixon, so the right-wing bigots of America can relax. It had to be that way. A Rockefeller adviser complained recently after his third interview with Nixon: "I agreed with everything he (Nixon) said, but each time I walked out of his office Strom Thurmond was waiting to come in." And what does Thurmond want? He wants us to spend billions and billions more on ways to blow up the world. And cut out this nonsense about the war on poverty. White folks in Thurmond's South Carolina are scratching out a miserable living on virtually nothing, but Thurmond wants to forget about all that poverty stuff and plunk down billions for the anti-ballistic missile—the biggest boondoggle to ever come down the political pike. . . . That's the way it is from the Hotel Pierre, where President-Elect Nixon is putting together the bits and pieces of his new government. A little tid bit for everybody: an offer of the UN ambassadorship to Humphrey, Secretary of Defense for Scoop Jackson (insiders tell us Jackson won't take it), and a nice strategic spot for Thurmond's legman. . . . This is the season for Great Society farewells. The packers and movers are in, tucking away files and mementos of a fading administration. There's a universal sadness about the departure from Washington of Lady Bird Johnson. She's been a remarkable woman. She did a lot more than plant pretty flowers and galivant around the country. Mrs. Johnson cared deeply about the poverty-stricken of this country. Sadly, she watched a cruel war diminish the opportunities to do as much as needed doing. And her beautifying bit was something which lifted up the whole scene, and got us thinking seriously about our sleazy surroundings. Two cabinet members who'll be greatly missed are Stewart Udall and Ramsey Clark. Udall was a Kennedy find, who stuck it out during 8 exciting years for conservation. We doubt any other President, Democrat or Republican, can ever find another man with the same vision, brains, and courage of Stewart Udall to preside over the nation's dwindling natural resources and properly tend our changing environment. Ramsey Clark is a Johnson production, and President Johnson can proudly take a bow for his appointment of this thoughtful, unruffled chief law enforcement officer. One of the cheapest things Nixon did during his acceptance speech was to single out Ramsey Clark for a round of booes. We predict Ramsey Clark will look good in the history books and that Nixon's attorney-general, whoever it is, will not measure up to Clark. . . . Those announcements of the death of Czech democracy are grossly exaggerated. The Czechs have a high fever and the medication they're getting from Russian quacks is no cure. The spirit of Czech nationalism is not dead, despite daily rumors it will die. Prague is filled with junketing experts who are filling stories that Dubcek's days are numbered, that the Russians will smother the fragile beginnings of democrary in Czechoslovakia. Maybe so—but it still hasn't happened. The human animal can be a tough cuss, especially after he's tasted the heady wine of political freedom. . . . Ralph Nader writes in Playboy: "Every year the public is mulcted of from $500 million to $1 billion by securities frauds alone. Dishonest and illegal practices in the area of drugs, therapeutic aids and home repairs rob the consumer of even more untold hundreds of millions of dollars annually. The automobile industry has knowingly permitted cars with safety defects to reach the market, with no effort to recall them or to inform the unwitting buyer. Irresponsible use of pesticides and chemicals, poison and kill thousands of human beings every year. Yet willful violations in all these areas are punished only by mild civil fines that will never deter corporate malpractice. The civil penalties generally meted out are so modest that the big corporation won't even blink an eye at them; and on the rare occasions when the fines are stiff, the corporations just pass the cost on to the consumer in the form of higher retail prices." . . . The UAW's good works offshoot, Citizen's Crusade Against Poverty, gets a strong pat on the back in an article in this month's Atlantic "Going Hungry in America." The scandal of plantation owners like Sen. James Eastland pocketing huge subsidies (last year the Eastland family got a $211,364 "welfare" check from the government) for not growing cotton, while millions still starve in this country is but a dramatic sidelight to the larger scandal of an agricultural political establishment which thumbs its nose at starving Americans, pays political homage to rich farmers, and then condemns the poor white and black people of America for demanding a share of the political action. The whole sordid story of buck-passing, hand-kissing, and politics-as-usual goes down as one of America's sorriest chapters in letting the worst reactionaries have their way about some of the nation's most serious backyard problems. People are still starving in America and politicians on Capitol Hill are still telling themselves it aint so. There's a great opportunity for a new administration to straighten things out. . . . Here's a sensational fact to tuck away: While the U.S. population has increased by 30 percent since 1950, the amount of waste has increased by 60 percent. U.S. Public Health Service estimates that in a typical year, Americans throw away over 30 million tons of paper, 4 million tons of plastic, 48 billion cans—more than 250 a person—and 26 billion bottles and jars, or more than 135 a person. Getting rid of all the junk is a huge problem. Manufacturers who design throwaway soft drink bottles do practically nothing to find places to throw these things once they're discarded.

Alliance of Teamsters, UAW Maps Bold Plans In Labor, Social Fields

Housing Ventures, Organizing Drive Are Among Goals; Financial Resources Large

Are the Partners Compatible?

By JAMES P. GANNON and

Staff Reporters of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON — The nation's two biggest, richest unions are quietly putting the finishing touches on the labor movement's first conglomerate.

Like today's multifaceted corporate conglomerates, the labor organization about to be launched by the United Auto Workers union and the Teamsters Union will engage in a kaleidoscopic array of activities. The UAW-Teamsters joint venture, the Alliance for Labor Action, is designed on so grand a scale that it could be the pride of the most ambitious corporate empire-builder.

According to the prospectus outlined by key planners of the ALA, the alliance will be:

—A real-estate developer, planning, designing and building low-cost urban housing for slum dwellers, retired union members and others, using advanced building technology.

—A private antipoverty program, sponsoring job-training centers and slum-neighborhood service centers that would take an ombudsman's role in helping the poor with legal, medical and financial problems.

—A ghetto-mobilizing "new politics" machine, organizing, registering and "educating" black and other minority voters to increase pressure on city hall, school boards, landlords and merchants.

—A new, well-financed organizing force, aiming to spread unionism to low-wage industries and to unorganized regions, such as the South.

—A new bargaining-table combine, backed by a huge strike fund, eager to match muscles and wits with corporate conglomerates.

A Final Fling

If the scheme seems grandiose, it is because some of the labor movement's most visionary planners are drafting it. The ALA is basically Walter Reuther's dream, but the idealistic UAW president has found in the Teamsters Union other big thinkers eager to embellish it. Many labor observers see the ALA as a final UAW president has found in the Teamsters Union other big thinkers eager to embellish it. Many labor observers see the ALA as a final, grand fling for the 61-year-old Mr. Reuther before retirement and as a hopeful grasp at respectability by the Teamsters Union, whose last two presidents have landed in prison.

The unlikely alliance of the UAW idealists and the hard-bitten Teamsters has led to widespread skepticism in the labor movement that the partnership will ever work. "It's a rope of sand," contends the leader of a big AFL-CIO union who thinks the Teamsters and UAW officials are such disparate characters they won't be able to work together.

The curious confederacy faces many sticky problems. Despite sales pitches to numerous unions, the partners have won only two small groups as allies—the 110,000-member International Chemical Workers Union and the breakaway New York division of the AFL-CIO's Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, embracing 30,000 workers. Hoped-for recruits, including the United Rubber Workers, the Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers and the International Longshoremen and Warehousemen, have hung back, though they could join later.

Tactical Problems

There are tactical problems, too. Various UAW and Teamsters men have differing ideas on just which workers should be organized by the ALA. Finding suitable targets for the ALA brand of "conglomerate bargaining" isn't easy either, because AFL-CIO unions have a strong foothold in most of the big, diversified companies.

And over the grand dream hangs a nightmare worry voiced by one UAW official: "What happens if Hoffa becomes free?" In the unlikely event that the jailed Teamster president is paroled from his eight-year jury-tampering sentence while still holding his office, then idealist Walter Reuther would find himself presiding along with ex-con Hoffa. Intimates say Mr. Reuther gets fretful and snappish when this possibility is even gently suggested.

The alliance's aims will be revealed publicly soon. After lengthy delay, the ALA will hold its first national conference here May 26 and 27. The meeting of some 500 UAW and Teamster officials and staff men from around the country will mark the formal launching of the joint venture agreed to last July.

"In 1969, we are going to provide some therapy to the American labor movement just as the CIO did in 1939," says Mr. Reuther, who vows the ALA will prod AFL-CIO leaders "to get off their rusty bottoms."

Adds acting Teamster chief Frank E. Fitzsimmons: "We're not going to come out of the sky wearing white robes and waving magic wands and expect everyone to capitulate or bow down. But we're ready to get off the ground with a program that reinvigorates the labor movement."

Ample Resources

Officials of the AFL-CIO, which expelled the Teamsters on corruption charges in 1957 and which the UAW quit last year, tend to scoff at the rival group's plans as grandstanding by Mr. Reuther, more rhetoric than action. But they privately concede the two strong alliance partners have the resources to make good on their big promises.

The Teamsters, with more than two million members, and the UAW, with some 1.6 million, are the largest unions in the U.S. Their combined net worth tops $170 million.

The alliance, insiders say, will be very well-heeled. To bankroll it, the two unions each have agreed to contribute a dime per member per month, or a total of nearly $4.5 million a year. (The AFL-CIO's head-tax yields about $11.5 million a year.) In addition, it's understood each union has earmarked an added $3 million or so for a "strike defense fund." The big war chest would be used to help weaker unions in strikes against strong employers, strategists say. Such aid to unions in distress could be a potent ALA recruiting tool.

The ALA partners have taken a five-year lease on a floor of a new, downtown Washington office building to serve as the alliance's national headquarters. A staff is being assembled, and each union plans to name a man to serve as deputy director of the ALA. To head the new organization, the unions are seeking "a man of stature," says one Teamster chieftain, but they apparently are having some difficulty finding one who wants the job. James J. Reynolds, former Under Secretary of Labor, turned it down.

Such problems have delayed the ALA's launching. "We're finding out we can't get going as fast as we thought we could," concedes a top Teamster. "There are lots of roadblocks when you are trying to design national programs."

The planning for the alliance has been done by two committees. A five-man group headed by Teamsters' Acting President Frank E. Fitzsimmons has mapped organizing and bargaining plans; a similar committee under Mr. Reuther's direction has outlined social and political activities.

Some of the ALA programs are firmly planned, but many others are still in formative stages. Subject to change, the planning committees have outlined four major areas of operation: Organizing, Bargaining, Social action and Politics.

Here's a sample of the planning in each area:

ORGANIZING: Recruiting many of the nation's 58 million unorganized workers into unions gets the top priority of the alliance. Farm workers, white-collar workers, service workers—what one official calls "the miscellaneous unorganized millions"—are among the targets.

"Who will we be organizing?" muses one planner. "Mostly the people the labor movement has been neglecting. They work in small manufacturing shops, retail stores, service establishments, sometimes for city governments. They are in considerable measure, minority-group members."

Some UAW men seem less interested in the miscellaneous millions than in industrial workers and white-collar employes. The chemical industry, especially lightly organized Du Pont Co., is attracting ALA attention. So are the thousands of white-collar employes of Blue Cross and Blue Shield medical insurance plans.

The alliance's promise to organize farm workers threatens a possible conflict with the AFL-CIO's United Farm Workers, headed by Cesar Chavez. The UAW has had close ties to Mr. Chavez's union, which is locked in a marathon struggle with California's grape growers. ALA men are hoping the UFW can cooperate with both the AFL-CIO and the alliance; if not, a tug-of-war for the farm union's allegiance is likely.

BARGAINING: The special target of the alliance's bargaining designs is the fast-growing corporate conglomerates, which pose a new challenge to unions; when a corporation is widely diversified, no one union can exert great pressure on it by striking.

AFL-CIO unions have tried to deal with this changed power balance through coordinated or coalition bargaining by several unions; the ALA is planning a similar approach but chooses to call it "conglomerate bargaining." A major problem, however, will be finding a target where the UAW and Teamsters are so dominant that cooperation of the AFL-CIO affiliates isn't crucial to success. One possibility under study: California-based FMC Corp., maker of food-processing machinery, power transmission equipment, chemicals, textiles, ordnance and other products.

Besides the conglomerates, the alliance aims to throw its weight against other selected employers. The big strike fund would be used to stiffen the backbone of weaker unions that the ALA decides to aid in struggles against "union-busting" companies. Just what strike situations would fit this designation isn't clear. In 1967, the UAW lent the United Rubber Workers $3 million to finance its strike against the major rubber companies, on the theory that the tire-makers were out to "destroy" the financially strapped union.

SOCIAL ACTION: Building low-cost housing for the inner-city poor and retirees will be high on the alliance's agenda. Planners aim to sponsor nonprofit housing projects financed mainly with Federal Government dollars. The ALA would put up "seed money" to buy land, hire architects and help pay for construction.

In California, alliance leaders are eying building sites in East Los Angeles, a mixed Negro and Mexican-American community, and in Richmond, a heavily Negro community across the bay from San Francisco. For retirees, the ALA is planning a "series" of projects for union pensioners and other lower-income aged folk "all across the country," says one official.

A rough prototype of the alliance housing projects, not directly connected to the ALA, exists in Detroit. There, the UAW has put up $1 million of the $5 million seed money for the Metropolitan Detroit Citizens Development Authority, which promotes low-cost housing spon-

WEEKEND WRAPUP

The Los Angeles and New York elections are clearly signs that the country is moving to the right, so we're told by the morning-after experts. More cops—hire more cops, this seems to be the rightwing answer to the ills of the big cities. And don't forget the Supreme Court. Get rid of those liberals who insist on reading the fine print in the Constitution. Well, brothers and sisters, it isn't all that simple. And we take for our text the report by a group of young, conservative Republican members of Congress who told President Nixon last week that there's more to campus disorders than a few troublemakers. The same is true with the frustrated, bitter blacks in our big cities who are polarizing the cities and the suburbs. We reap the whirlwind. We allow rat-infested slums, we provide custodial education to black kids, we slam the door on those black kids at the hiring gates—and now we wonder why there's hostility. Crime, whether by black or white, is a phenomena of youth, and these are times when the accent is on youth. It's the result of a post-war baby boom. We've spent our money on highways, arms, suburban sprawl, and shopping centers. We look around and it's not much to look at. Most kids today are groping for a way toward the good life. But, black or white, they don't like what they see, they blame their elders for a job badly done, and they expect something better. We doubt if there's a conservative politician in the country who can respond to these problems—unless they go talk to the kids and find out precisely what's bugging them. For those Republican congressmen who did just that, we offer our compliments and put their thoughts down as signs that the cautious center is waking up. . . . Mrs. Virginia Knauer, the Nixon consumer expert, deserves praise for coming to the rescue of the hot dog. Mrs. Knauer joins Arnold Mayer of the Meat Cutters Union and other pro-consumer types in stating that hot dogs should contain no more than 30 percent fat content and the ingredients of hot dogs should be clearly stated on the package. Consumers have a right to know what they are eating, and unless the Knauers and Mayers of this world rise up and demand it, the special interest groups in Washington will see that consumers stay in the dark. . . . Law and order is our favorite subject, and it will be interesting to see how the law and order crowd in Congress responds to the Adam Clayton Powell decision by the Supreme Court. The Court ruled that Congress can't throw a man out of Congress if the people from his district vote for him and if he complies with the minimum requirements. The flamboyant Mr. Powell was an easy target for congressmen who wanted to play the backlash game. . . . Who bugged Martin Luther King's phones, J. Edgar Hoover or Robert Kennedy? Neither Dr. King nor Sen. Kennedy are alive to defend themselves. But this didn't keep FBI Director Hoover from jumping in with his version of the facts. Former Attorney-General Ramsey Clark, a great and good man, said Mr. Hoover's account was unfair "because it comes after Robert Kennedy and Martin Luther King have been murdered in the service of humanity and are unable to defend themselves." Clark says that "selective materials from FBI files" released by Hoover were "deceptive in depicting Mr. Hoover as a reluctant eavesdropper of Dr. King. He (Hoover) repeatedly requested me to authorize a FBI wiretap on Dr. King while I was Attorney-General. The last of these requests, none of which were granted, came two days before the murder of Dr. King." Former Attorney General Katzenbach, who was undersecretary to Kennedy said "to say or imply that this tap was the original conception of Robert Kennedy . . . is false," indicating that Hoover pressured Kennedy into tapping Dr. King. . . . The surtax will go up to 10 percent for six months and the 7 percent investment credit will be knocked out—if the House Ways and Means has its way. Inside the tax-writing committee there are loud protests that tax reform can't wait, that comprehensive tax reform ought to be part of the surtax package. Many House liberals peeved by foot-dragging on loopholes vow they'll vote down the surtax. Congressman Ray Madden, a fire-eating Indiana populist, expects to ask his House Rules Committee for an unprecedented open rule on the surtax extension. . . . The tobacco lobby won a big victory last week. They got the House of Represen-

Tax Reformers Against Surtax

Congressman intent on tax reform say they'll vote down the 10 percent surtax scheduled for House action this week. Unless Congress and the White House agree to combine major tax reform with the surtax, the House liberals say they will vote the surtax down. "We feel the oil and gas lobbyists have made a deal with House leaders and the White House, and tax reform in this Congress is doomed unless the leadership gets the message loud and strong." Nine out of 15 Democrats on the House Ways and Means Committee voted against the surtax bill coming up this week.

Gas blasts rip Gary

Fight flames in homes as thousands flee fumes

By David S. Robinson and Dennis Fisher

Nine persons were injured and thousands of others evacuated Tuesday after a series of gas explosions and fires struck southwest Gary.

Gary Mayor Richard G. Hatcher, on the scene with city officials, declared an 8 p.m. curfew for the 18-square-block area hit hardest.

Six homes in the area were destroyed, Hatcher said, and 18 others damaged, in the explosions and fires caused by a massive, high-pressure gas leak.

Fire Chief Alfonse Holliday estimated damage at more than $340,000. Nine of the homes struck by the blasts were unable, he said, and additional homes were damaged by embers and small fires.

Five of the injured were admitted to Gary hospitals. The others were treated and released.

State and local police evacuated thousands of residents from a 108-square-block area when a south wind spread the smell of gas over a large part of the city's predominantly residential Glen Park section.

Hatcher said he was told by Northern Indiana Public Service Co. that a faulty regulator on a gas main caused backup pressure that led to the explosions and fires.

A company spokesman said there was a massive increase in gas pressure in the area just before the explosions.

Witnesses told tales of watching burners and pilot lights flare into four-foot-high flames as the gas pressure rose to a critical point.

At least 320 homes were without gas service Tuesday night, a company spokesman said, but service had been restored to other homes

Unionist says $1 item could have barred gas blasts

A simple regulator costing less than $1 for each outlet could have prevented the June 3 natural gas disaster in Gary that hurt nine persons and damaged or destroyed 30 homes, a labor union official said Thursday.

Robert C. Tibbs of St. Louis, business manager of Local 5-6, AFL-CIO Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers Union, told newsmen here that the accident illustrates the need for a better national pipeline safety act.

"The Gary explosion shouldn't have happened," Tibbs said. "There is a simple device that can be installed at every outlet to prevent such things from occurring."

Northern Indiana Public Service Co. blamed the accident on a faulty regulator in its low-pressure gas main in Gary's Glen Park neighborhood. When the regulator failed, the gas pressure increased twentyfold and sent gas shooting through outlets in homes.

With individual regulators at each outlet to customers, Tibbs said, the failure of the regulator in the gas main would not have triggered the costly accident

8. Pipeline Safety

Criminal penalties against violations of a new pipeline safety bill was a test of the Senate's willingness to write a tough bill to protect the public from gas pipeline explosions and other hazards. The motion to include criminal penalties was defeated 31 to 44. A + vote is a vote for strong pipeline safety.

A gas explosion in Gary . . . a congressional hearing a year ago . . . a union man's testimony last week . . . and a UAW roll-call; how do they all fit together? The explosion (like scores which occur and are only reported locally) could have been prevented by a simple gas regulator; but this and other safety features are not used because Congress failed to pass a law which tightens and toughens gas pipelines in big urban centers. The UAW roll call tells who voted how in the Senate. There was never a definitive roll call in the House; all the damage was done behind closed doors in committee.

Dear Carroll:

When you were in Atlanta for the A.L.A. Conference we discussed the possibility of getting together with UAW staff with education responsibilities here in Atlanta. I wanted you to know that I am available and interested.

We also discussed the possibility of sending Southern Regional Council materials to all or to some selected group of UAW staff working in the South. An arrangement which we have worked out with some unions, at least as an introductory offer, is to send all of our publications for a yearly subscription fee of $5.00. Normally our quarterly, New South, is $3.00 per year and our pamphlet series is $5.00.

Under separate cover I am sending you a selection of our publications of the sort that have recently gone to the union staff people.

I would be very pleased to meet with you and whoever else you suggest here in Atlanta. Let me know if the pamphlet idea has any appeal.

Sincerely,

GIVE MR. NIXON CREDIT—breaking the ice with China is going to be good for world peace. It's a funny twist of history that the same Republicans who got us into a 20-year deep freeze with China are the same ones who are getting us out. China has overshadowed, for a time at least, the U.S. failure to respond to the latest peace offers of the Viet Cong; and Mr. Nixon is crescendoing his way to some dramatic world moves in next year's election year. Nixon insiders are grinning at this diplomatic coup which has suddenly put the world upside down. The secret mission to Peking caught every reporter and congressional know-it-all unawares. There is a great hunger for peace which responds to every U.S. initiative—witness the Khrushchev trip to the U.S. and Kosygin's trip to Glassboro, N.J. High hopes will ride with the Nixon-Mao exchange, and every patriot must wish them well. The China lobby kept the South Vietnamese cranky during the election eve suspense in 1968 and Louis Harris has suggested that Ky's balkiness swung just enough votes to Nixon to make him President. Now Nixon has swung open the door to 750 million Chinese we tried for 21 years to treat as invisible.

SICKNESS INSURANCE—What few Americans have insurance for health have "sickness insurance," not to be confused with health insurance (which puts the emphasis on keeping in good health, not taking care of sickness after good health fails). The American Medical Association's $1.5 million campaign to confuse the American public on the facts about health care is up to some interesting tricks. One ad which appeared recently talks about helping returning Vietnam medic vets get into the health care system as physicians assistants. Great idea, except the AMA brought on the health crisis and the AMA's feeble steps to make amends are hard to swallow. Another cute AMA spot announcement is really farout, suggesting that environmental neglect is the reason we have bad health. The real unwritten story about the AMA, however, is the mass desertion from the ranks of the AMA which is occuring right under the nose of the medical establishment. Many younger doctors are rebelling against the hidebound theories. The Griffiths-Corman-Kennedy bills require doctors to hit the books, keep abreast of new developments in medical science—a notion the new

Give us at least $150 million

The UAW is asking Congress for at least $150 million to make the job safety and health law work for the 57 million workers it covers. The Nixon administration is asking for one-third this amount. If you think your job should get a federal inspection, if noise, dust, chemicals, and other dangerous hazards bother you—then let Congress know you want no less than $150 million for safety and health at the workplace.

breed of doctors fresh out of med school like, but which doesn't sit too well with some of the oldguard.

TRADITIONAL JOBS—The Chinese believe in "saving face." So do Americans. Mr. Nixon's trip to China may, with the help of the Chinese, help the U.S. save face in Vietnam. Mr. Nixon saved face by calling the public service employment bill a way to provide "transitional" jobs for the unemployed. The key words last year were "deadend jobs" which was supposed to be bad. Regardless of what kind of jobs they are called, there are 200,000 jobs around which Congress voted for and which the President signed for. And a lot of cities will have some slots filled at long last.

EXIT HUGHES—If you don't have a financial angel, you might as well forget about running for President. Sen. Harold Hughes of Iowa bowed out last week because he couldn't put together the money needed for a national campaign. The crop of Democratic candidates is large and excellent, but it is all that Party Chairman Larry O'Brien can do to keep them from soaking up all the money or bumping into each other before the big convention next year. Sen. Hughes will be missed. He represented a progressive and antiwar combination the Democratic Party needs to deserve victory in 1972. Mary McGrory, a sympathetic Hughes-watcher, thinks Sen. Hughes did not bow out for lack of money. Rather Hughes felt awkward at scrambling for votes and money. His departure does leave a gap in stature which the other contenders must fill.

SAM EPSTEIN—The name eludes me, is how one writer spoke of Dr. Sam Epstein, one of the nation's toughest toxicologists and a boatrocker among many establishment scientists who feed off government grants. Environmental Protection Agency Chief William Ruckelhaus innocently read off a speech (probably ghosted in good faith by a government flack) which quoted some tough words from Epstein—and this set off a terrible ruckus among the play-it-safe scientists who were listening at this particular meeting. Last week Epstein came back to Washington with an eloquent appeal to keep a ban on a dangerous weedkiller (2,4,5-T) which tests show results in birth defects in laboratory animals. Powerful chemical companies are trying to get the ban lifted, but Epstein and some of Ralph Nader's people have mobilized a strong environmental bloc to uphold the ban.

NO CBS CONTEMPT—The turnaround on the contempt citation for CBS has enough drama for a CBS documentary. Liberals and conservatives for differing reasons ganged up on Chairman Harley Staggers and gave a rebuff to his contempt charge against the Columbia Broadcasting System. There is mistrust of TV, despite the fact people get most of their news from it and tend to trust it more. Too much TV newsreporting is hitched to showmanship and stories which contain "motion excitement." Still the sorriest aspect of the Poor, workers hurt most by foul neglect of environments

By MARION EDEY

The rats in the ghetto, the lead paint peeling from tenement walls, the overcrowding, air pollution and inadequate transportation that plague the inner city—all these are environmental problems, and are receiving increasing attention from environmental groups.

The black man in the ghetto and the working man in the factory suffer more acutely for the simple reason that they cannot escape.

There are a hundred ways that an affluent person can cushion himself from his environment.

He can buy a house far out in the suburbs and drive to work in an air-conditioned car; his garbage disposal takes care of the garbage; he can buy bottled water if the tapwater is unfit to drink.

He can even buy a private summer home if the park facilities are overcrowded.

But what is a more general, long term problem for the rich is for the poor an immediate threat to life and health. Anyone tempted to view ecology as purely a middle-class issue should take a hard look at the following issues:

Pesticides

The comprehensive Mrak study for the Department of Health, Education and Welfare found that black people had almost twice as much DDT in their fat tissues as did white people. This can be explained largely through differences in diet. Because fish is cheap and rich in protein it is a staple food for low-income families in coastal cities. But most fish are at the top of a long food-chain and therefore have high concentrations of DDT, mercury, and other poisons.

Lead poisoning

Between 250,000 and 400,000 inner city children have unsafe levels of lead in the blood, and over 6,000 will suffer mental retardation or death from lead poisoning.

The most severe cases involve eating lead paint, but merely breathing the air in New York City can cause unsafe levels of lead in the blood.

A study by Dr. Ronald Engel for the Environmental Protection Agency indicates that ambient lead levels in the air can cause acute lead poisoning in children who would otherwise recover from eating lead paint. Some environmental groups are now supporting efforts to get full appropriations for the Lead Based Paint Poisoning Prevention Act, which received no funding last year.

The work environment

The people who suffer most severely from irresponsible corporate pollution policies are often the workers in their own plants. A good example is the Allied Chemical Plant in Moundsville, W. Va., where Public Health officials found mercury vapor levels eight times the safety limit. A comprehensive Public Health Survey found that 46% of all workers in Chicago were subjected to urgent or serious health hazards.

It is easy to understand why workers rated health and safety hazards as the number two item in a scale of 19 job complaints, according to a poll by the Labor Department. They would probably be still more concerned if they realized the extent of in-plant pollution; another Denver study indicated that 75% of the workers exposed to such hazards were unaware of them.

Environmentalists who once neglected this issue are now keenly aware of its importance, and actively supported union efforts to get a strong Occupational Safety and Health bill through the Congress last year.

Transportation

New transportation priorities are essential to the survival of the cities, and this issue is perhaps the strongest bond between conservationists and inner city residents. Both are united in a struggle for more and better mass transit as opposed to the proliferation of highways. Many of the urban poor do not have cars, and they are strangled by highways that displace them from their homes and result in more traffic and air pollution.

The Los Angeles Riot Study by Dr. Nathan Cohen found that transportation problems were one of the major grievances reported by ghetto residents. The Labor Department poll mentioned above found that transportation problems ranked third among all the worker's job complaints.

Environmental groups who began by opposing highways through parks and urban areas are now strongly supporting mass transit funding as an alternative.

Solid waste

No one has a higher stake in developing adequate systems for solid waste disposal than do the ghetto dwellers who watch the garbage pile up on their streets.

The soaring populations of rats which plague the inner city are a direct result of our failure to deal with this problem or to recycle our resources.

The heavy use of poisons to control populations of rats and cockroaches doubtless contributes to the high levels of chemicals like DDT in poor black people.

Air pollution

Air and water pollution despoil our countryside far more severely in the inner city than in rural or suburban areas. Air pollution is directly or indirectly responsible for the deaths of hundreds of people in the inner city every year; in New York City, deaths from emphysema alone have risen 500% in the last ten years.

Studies indicate that air pollution is usually most severe in low-income neighborhoods. One out of four patients in the Harlem hospital now suffer from athsma, compared to 5% in 1952.

When environmental groups began their major lobbying campaign for a strong Clean Air bill last year, they received support from numbers of urban organizations and unions such as the Steelworkers and the Oil, Chemical, and Atomic Workers.

Water pollution

In many cities the tapwater contains poisonous heavy metals in amounts above the levels considered safe by the Public Health Service. People seeking to avoid them have swelled the sales of bottled water by 15-20% a year. In the San Joaquin Valley the average nitrate concentrations in the water are nearly twice the safety limit, and parents are sometimes warned not to give tapwater to babies who might suffer mental retardation as a result. But how can a poor family of migrant workers afford to buy bottled water?

Population

Nearly all our urban problems are aggravated by a population growth which outstrips the capacity of existing facilities and increases critical housing and teacher shortages.

Environmental groups actively support more funding for family planning clinics to help parents avoid unwanted children. Conservationists efforts are not confined to the poor, but aimed also at the affluent who put a greater pressure on their environment by consuming more resources.

Our abuse of human and natural resources is caused by apathy, corruption, and the drive for private gain at public expense.

To cure it will require the close cooperation and hard work of all environmental and citizens groups concerned with the public interest. We must provide the leadership to unite these groups, and be careful not to split them apart.

whole TV story is the fact that TV has never achieved its full potential, and rather than mislead most Americans (as the citation implied) the TV media puts most people to sleep or drives people back to the printed page or the neighborhood flick.

WHY ARE THEY HEALTHIER? Everytime we look at the list of countries where people live to riper and older ages than Americans, we wonder why. Experts tell us that getting a physical exam frequently, seeing a doctor when you want to, getting a specialist without worry about the cost—these are some of the factors that make people in other nations live longer than Americans. We have more doctors per population than those other countries, and we spend more money on health care than any other nation of the world—but we just don't live longer. It will be interesting to see if the tricky ads the American Medical Association is running will address itself to these very plain facts. We predict the AMA will try to divert our attention from the facts and conjure up farfetched demons about socialism. And we predict that Americans won't fall for it—at least not the generation of kids coming up these days. The young don't always know what they want, but they do know what they don't want. And they don't want name-calling as an explanation for national failure.

FTC DOES IT AGAIN—There's something happening at the Federal Trade Commission—and it's good for consumers. The FTC used to grind out press releases about insignificant frauds, while gigantic con games were pouring out of the TV tube. Now the FTC has accused U.S. and foreign auto companies of making advertising claims which are dishonest. A lot of Washington lawyers make a good living keeping the FTC off the backs of dishonest corporations, so we don't know if the latest FTC gambit will pay off in results. But it should. The slump in auto sales these days is not just a case of thin money. Consumers want their money's worth. They want honest repair service. They want cars that work. And they want service that they can depend on. Nothing fancy. Just an honest deal. All the advertising fluff makes the American consumer wary—and at long last the Federal Trade Commission is doing something about it.

THE LADIES ARE FOR REAL—A lot of women are tired of always doing the dishes at home and stuffing the envelopes in a political campaign. They want more. And by the looks of what happened in Washington last weekend, they are going to get more political clout in the 1972 conventions. When you get Lyndon Johnson's Liz Carpenter and Greenwich Village's Bella Abzug on the same team, if you are running for office you'd better watch out. The fact that President Nixon could crack jokes about this serious drive for more votes in the candidate-selection process shows you how far our Chief Executive is off base.

HOW MUCH PROOF DO YOU NEED?—An unpublished study of blue collar workers and union officials shows that "good health and safety practices" ranks as the number one problem, while "adequate income" ranks fifth in a scale of five considerations (besides health and safety, they were income, opportunity to grow on the job, fair employment, and workmen's compensation). Union officials and union stewards in the study both put income at the head of their list. Of course, workers should not have to choose between safe and healthful jobs and adequate income. But the fact that so many surveys show this deep concern for safety and health on the job is an indicator that the nation needs to do more. Last week Wisconsin's Sen. Bill Proxmire joined the list of lawmakers who are demanding that we reorder our priorities by increasing the federal expenditures for job safety and health.

SOMETHING WRONG—Mary Lasker has been a friend of good causes for years and years. She cares about national health. When a lot of ladies would be sipping tea in garden parties, Mrs. Lasker is out campaigning for national health insurance. Last week Mrs. Lasker said Americans spend more for chewing gum and candy than they spend on research on killing and crippling disease. She said both the citizenry and government have misplaced their values, noting that health research more than pays its way. The national death rate declined between 1944 and 1967, resulting in the saving of 8 million lives. Wage earners whose lives were saved during this time earned an estimated $102.5 billion and paid $12.5 billion in taxes. During this 23 year period, Mrs. Lasker said, the government spent $8.7 billion for its national institutes of health—so that the government got $4.1 billion more in taxes during the added lifetime of these people.

WEEKEND WRAPUP

PRESIDENT WOODCOCK tells Congress that giant corporations set high prices to gain still higher profits, urges price-wage review board to get the facts out in the open.

THE CAMERAS GLARE, the room is filled with curious congressional staffers, and the press. UAW President Woodcock is in Washington again to plead the workers' case. Do something about rising prices, but don't take it out of the hide of workers. Put the spotlight on 100 giant corporations which dominate the U. S. economy. Make them tell the public what their profits are, what their unit labor costs are. Get that out in the open. And make the biggies in U. S. industry come before a public board 60 days before they put over a price increase. During that time they must tell everything they know. That's where the damage is done. Not wages. A poor, lonely hospital worker may get a pay increase, but she starts from below the poverty level—so her pay increase is part of the war on poverty. Auto workers consistently have won pay increases in line with national productivity increases — the auto productivity is a big secret. Nobody knows. The Lordstown plant which turns out GM Vegas is probably the biggest and best producer in the business—but the unit labor costs at Lordstown, as throughout the auto industry, are secret. All we have to go by are the national productivity figures.

WHEN A RECESSION HITS, then productivity slumps. That's the word of Nat Weinberg, the UAW's chief economist. Productivity

UAW President Leonard Woodcock called for congressional enactment of a sweeping series of programs to revitalize and stabilize the nation's economy after the 90-day wage freeze.

Testifying last week before the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, Woodcock urged

- Enactment of a novel "Income Equalization Tax."
- Creation of a new tax to promote and in-

ADD 1 ECONOMY, WASHINGTON (UPI-64)

THE HEAD OF THE UNITED AUTO WORKERS, LEONARD WOODCOCK, SAID PRESIDENT NIXON'S ECONOMIC PROGRAM REFLECTS "A PERVERSE SENSE OF NATIONAL PRIORITIES" THAT WILL MAKE THE RICH RICHER AT THE EXPENSE OF THE POOR.

WOODCOCK, TESTIFYING BEFORE PROXMIRE'S COMMITTEE, URGED CONGRESS T REJECT ALMOST ALL OF THE PRESIDENT'S PROGRAM AND TO ENACT INSTEAD LEGISLATION TO HOLD DOWN PRICES AND TO GIVE CONSUMERS A SHARE OF THE TAX-CUT "WINDFALL" THAT HE SAID THE PLAN PROPOSES FOR BUSINESS.

WOODCOCK SUPPORTED ONLY THREE OF THE FACTS OF NIXON'S PROGRAM: REPEAL OF THE "DISCRIMINATORY" 7 PER CENT AUTO EXCISE TAX, THE FLOATING OF THE DOLLAR IN INTERNATIONAL TRADE, AND THE TEMPORARY 10 PER CENT IMPORT SURCHARGE.

THE REST OF THE PROGRAM "IS A CONFESSION OF THE FAILURE" OF THE ADMINISTRATION'S PREVIOUS EVONOMIC POLICIES AND IS "EQUALLY MISGUIDED," WOODCOCK SAID.

"IT WILL HAVE LITTLE, IF ANY EFFECT IN REDUCING THE PRESENT INTOLERABLE LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT," HE SAID. "IT IS RIFE WITH INEQUITIES. AND IT REFLECTS A PERVERSE SENSE OF NATIONAL PRIORITIES...

"IN EFFECT, THE REVENUE REDUCTIONS AND SPENDING CUTS IN COMBINATION REPRESENT A TRANSFER FROM THE POOR TO THE RICH. IT IS THIS FACT THAT HAS GIVEN RISE TO THE PHRASE 'ROBIN HOOD IN RECERSE'."

WOODCOCK WAS PARTICULARLY CRITICAL OF NIXON'S PROPOSAL TO INCREASE THE INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT FOR BUSINESS. HE PROPOSED INSTEAD THAT BUSINESS TAXES BE INCREASED AND THAT THE PUBLIC BE GIVEN A GREATER TAX BREAK.

tensify corporate competition with imports,

- Establishment of a voluntary and tripartite stabilization mechanism for Phase II, and
- Formation of a Price-Wage Review Board as an ongoing mechanism to prevent inflation in the future.

Attacking the Nixon Administration's "tax giveaways" to corporations and the sharp inequities of the wage freeze, Woodcock charged that the President's "New Economic Policy" is misguided in most of its main features. It "will have little, if any, effect in reducing the present intolerable level of unemployment.

"It is rife with inequities. And it reflects a perverse sense of national priorities," he said.

Woodcock told Congress: "Clearly, ours is an economy that now needs the stimulus of sharp increases in demand—

- Increases in consumer spending by the tens of millions of families whose incomes are below the level determined by the Bureau of Labor Statistics to be the minimum necessary for a 'modest but adequate' standard of living
- Increases in government spending to ease the financial plight of the cities,
- To cope with environmental pollution,
- To eliminate urban blight,
- To improve education,
- To bring adequate health care within the reach of all,
- To end poverty,
- To provide efficient and reliable mass transportation,
- To create a sound system of criminal justice and rehabilitation,
- To improve recreational facilities and
- To deal with all the other deficiencies in the public sector."

The UAW president challenged Nixon's proposals for a corporate investment tax credit, tax incentives for "research and development" and tax exemptions for profits of export sales subsidiaries, along with recently liberalized depreciation regulations.

These measures, he said, would lead to a tax revenue loss averaging an estimated $10 billion a year —"equal to 25 per cent of the profits taxes paid by corporations in 1968, the all-time record high year for corporate profits.

"To turn those revenues over to corporations in a slack economy is to drain them out of the stream of job-creating demand and to divert them into idle savings in corporate treasuries and the coffers of wealthy stockholding families," Woodcock asserted.

"To use them, instead, for public purposes or to improve the after-tax buying power of low-income families would be to generate high-velocity purchasing power, lifting the economy toward full employment, which is by far the best and most effective stimulus to increased investment and intensified training, financed entirely by business, of the so-called 'hard-core' unemployed."

Woodcock said that news media reports "on the predictions of Secretary of Commerce Stans with respect to Phase II (of the President's economic plan) sound an ominous warning that the Administration may be bent on imposing grave inequities upon America's workers—to make them and them alone bear the sacrifices of combatting inflation.

Only Congress can stand in the way and see to it that equity is done."

Woodcock urged enactment of the bill sponsored by Rep. Henry Reuss, D-Wis., for a Price-Wage Review Board. He said this measure, HR 10592, would provide a "sound mechanism to deal with the immediate problem and one that would serve also as an on-going safeguard against future inflation."

Saying "I am realist enough, however, to know that a direct move from the freeze to the machinery and procedures of HR 10592 is not going to occur," Woodcock strongly emphasized that the only alternative acceptable to organized labor would be a "voluntary and tripartite mechanism" such as the stabilization boards established in the Korean War and World War II.

He added: " 'Voluntary' means that the government keeps hands off, stays out and leaves all decisions, including those pertaining to standards, rules, regulations and procedures, to the sense of public responsibility of the labor and management parties directly concerned.

"It means also that those parties select their own representatives to develop and implement the program. 'Tripartite' means that labor has an equal voice with management in all decisions, with deadlocks between them broken by public members who are independent of any form of government control and whose impartiality and integrity is beyond question."

Woodcock proposed an innovative Income Equalization Tax if Phase II of the wage freeze "provides for any form of restraint of wages to which non-wage incomes are not subjected."

This new tax would be designed to make the average rate of increase in unearned incomes equal to the average rate of increases in wages. It would be based on the principle that increases from non-wage income should not outstrip wage increases while the latter are under restraint.

The novel tax would be applied to profits, dividends, capital gains and other kinds of non-wage income. Woodcock said that study of such a tax as applied to profits indicate it "would have the effects of increasing output, sharply reducing unemployment and markedly retarding the rate of price increase."

The UAW president also proposed a new and special tax designed expressly to promote competition with imports—"a form of tax that would give the auto industry, and other industries similarly guilty of refusal to compete with imports, a powerful incentive to change their ways."

The "Competition Promotion Tax" would apply only to corporations in industries where average rates of profits on net worth for the industry had persistently and significantly exceeded the average rate for all manufacturing corporations and where imports of the general kind made by the industry exceeded a specified percentage; for example, 10 per cent of total domestic production during the tax year. Woodcock suggested that a "significantly" higher profit might be 15 per cent above the average, and that a "persistently" excessive profit might be over a period of the preceding five years.

The tax, itself, would be applied through a detailed formula under which the firms could increase their after-tax profits only by reducing gross profits through cutting prices, by reducing the flow of competitive imports or by a combination of both.

Woodcock urged the Joint Economic Committee "to look into the possibility of this type of tax as one means to correct the balance-of-payments deficit, to create additional employment in domestic industry and to regain the former share of the United States in the world market for automobiles and for other products as well."

He pointed out that in the U.S. auto industry, whose profits persistently exceed the average for all manufacturing corporations while, simultaneously, 16 per cent of the domestic market is served by imports, "the conclusion is inescapable that the industry is refusing to engage in price competition with imports."

Woodcock supported elimination of the federal excise tax on cars, providing the full amount is passed on to consumers, the suspension of convertibility of dollars into gold and the temporary 10 per cent import surcharge. He proposed a means of assuring consumers that they continue to get the benefit of excise tax elimination year after year.

He called, however, for action to increase the personal income tax exemption to $750 and the standard deduction to 15 per cent retroactively to last Jan. 1, a year earlier than the Administration's proposal. He also urged a substantial increase in the low income-tax allowance.

"Tell you what I'm gonna do . . . ."

was up during the years 1960 to 1965—then we had two mini-recessions, and productivity dropped. Why? White collar workers are the last to be laid off, they are overhead, they don't produce anything that goes into the gross national product, so productivity drops under those circumstances.

HOW ABOUT WORKER SAFETY as a productivity factor? If the Nixon Administration wants to get America moving again, why not make working conditions safer and healthier? Why not enforce the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970? Why not hire more safety inspectors to reduce the noise and ventilate the plants? The National Safety Council estimates we lose $20 billion from unsafe and unhealthy workplace environments. A real measure would double that figure. And if working conditions were better, the productivity would soar. Yet the nation's smarty pants are going to rev up the U. S. economy by giving more to the people that already have too much. Meanwhile, millions upon millions of American workers will have their paychecks frozen and nothing will be done to police the working conditions where noise, chemicals, and dust shorten their lives and impair their health contrary to the law of the land. It's the biggest law and order issue waiting for politicians to pick up. The only person in public life who faintly understands this is Adam Walinsky, who ran for New York Attorney-General and was formerly a speechwriter for the late Sen. Robert Kennedy. Walinsky built his whole campaign around occupational safety and health. He has the state labor inspectors so nervous today they jump when a union man sounds the alarm. A state inspector roared into the front gate of the GM Rochester Products plant to respond to a worker's complaint, flashed his badge and when he got within 20 feet of a machine belching dangerous levels of a certain chemical, he shut down the machine—or red-tagged it.

THE PRESS AND NADER—There is no better copy in town than Ralph Nader, whose exposes do legwork for many a reporter in Washington. So it was only returning a favor for Mr. Nader when the White House press corps peppered Nixon's press secretary with questions loaded with heavy sarcasm over the question of Mr. Nader's non-invitation to the consumer briefing on Phase 2. "Ron, does the White House know of any other group which has been as effective as Mr. Nader's?" is how the questioning went. "Yes," came the reply. "What groups are they?" the reporter persisted. "I won't go through the list. It is posted," the grim-faced Ron Ziegler stumbled on. It was a devastating exchange, and, of course, only raised Mr. Nader's credibility as a consumer spokeman to an alltime high. Meanwhile the real battle in Washington revolved around a pitched battle for a consumer protection agency that had real teeth, in which Mr. Nader was leading the legislative charge. Washington has a multiplicity of laws which get passed and then become empty shells They have been called no-law laws. They have fancy titles. But no money and no guts. Another consumer law which has no power to dig in and get the facts would be an incredible farce.

FAT IN HAMBURGER—One way the get-rich-fast bunch intends to bypass the price freeze is to slowly lower quality in the goods you pay for. Next time you're in the supermarket take a good look at the hamburger. See if there isn't more fat in it, even though the price-tag may be the same.

CHINA CONUNDRUM—The Nixon trip to China is something the American people, in fact the whole world, welcomes. But there are some lingering doubts about its purpose. "The suspicion that he is going to China just for the ride is growing," says Mary McGrory. "Nothing could be nicer than to be in Peking while his enemies are trudging through the early primaries. It is better to be lectured about imperialism in Chinese than to hear the diatribes of his rivals in English." We hope that Mr. Nixon, the past master of communist-baiting, accomplishes something for world peace. Opening the door to China is a vital step, made urgent by the total disintegration of monolithic communism. But the American people, who dream as much for lasting peace as any, will lapse into despondency if it's only a show and nothing else.

ATTICA AGAIN—We are all searching our souls these days as we examine what little facts we can grasp about the Attica prison revolt. A new breed of black militant is behind bars in many states. They are often the victims of poverty and slums, and while their crimes are brutal their heritage is brutal, too. The little money this country spends on crime prevention and basic research into the cause of crime is paltry. Too much goes for bigger sirens and red lights for prowl cars, and not enough for halfway houses and better prison conditions.

Some Suggestions on How to Proceed

First read the leaflet "Some Simple Facts about the Fair Labor Standards Act," which explains the background of the Act; the minimum wage regulations in general; and the way to report possible violations. This leaflet is written for laymen, not lawyers or economists, and can easily be understood by everyone in your chapter.

Then go through the rest of the material in the kit, using the table of contents as a guide. Some of the material offers further explanations and information for you, some can be used in your campaign.

Then at a meeting of your chapter have two or three people who have studied the kit explain the law and a possible campaign to the entire membership.

Here are some things individual chapter members can do to help publicize the law.

Be certain that everybody in your family or among your friends who is an employer understands how the law affects him. Look in the list of publications and send for leaflets explaining the law in relations to specific industries.

Look for the red-and-white poster, of which there is a sample in this kit, in all places of employment that you enter as a customer. Covered establishments are supposed to display it. If it is not displayed and you think it ought to be, speak to the employer.

Carry copies of the poster to your church, club, fraternal organization to publicize the law. Additional copies are available from your nearest office of the Wages and Hours Division.

Ask individual wage earners that you know about wages and hours in their places of employment, and tell them about the law's new regulations.

You may be interested in this experiment in "liberal education" which Bernie Karsh and Joe Gusfield developed for "4th year" Steelworkers this past summer. The program seemed to go well.

We had about twelve students per week for each of two weeks. The local union officers and committeemen spent all of their class time dealing with the subject matter in the notebook--they took no other daytime courses or workshops. Thus, they spent a total of about thirty hours during the week on this material. Morning sessions were spent discussing the documents in the notebook while afternoons were given over to discussion of the content and implications of Huxley's BRAVE NEW WORLD.

The "discussion questions," some of which were prepared in advance of the program and others of which were raised during the sessions, were not included in the notebook provided the students. They are included here, however, to give you some idea of how we sought to relate the reading materials to the theme of the program--"Freedom and Authority in Modern Society."

Not all of the documents provided in the notebook were discussed. We deliberately included more materials than we expected to use in order to provide some flexibility. For example, documents 1 and 2 (Session 3) were discussed much more fully than documents 1, 2, and 3, Session 4. Document 4 (Lewis and the UMWA) was discussed for approximately four hours over two days.

Needless to say, it was not the intention of the program or the instructors to solve problems but rather to provoke discussion of serious issues. Not all of the students in the class were able to assimilate the reading materials and the ideas which they suggested. But it appeared that those who had difficulty reading, particularly Huxley's book, found sufficient stimulation in the class sessions to participate in the discussions of the ideas which the readings suggested. A few of the students were clearly bothered by the questioning of many accepted values.

We do not consider either the materials selected or the discussion questions as "fixed" and therefore ready to be put to work by other instructors or with other groups. Indeed, we will continue to experiment with the materials, their order of presentation and the questions for discussion.

One last point. These materials are not for publication. No copyright clearances have been obtained for any of the "documents."

Foreword

This is the 13th Annual Steelworkers Summer School at the University of Illinois, sponsored by your international union and Districts 31, 32, and 34. It is made up of specific programs of courses for first, second, third, and fourth year students in the mornings.

The first year program deals with The Steelworker--His Union and His Job; second year, The Steelworker--His Community and His Job; third year, The Challenge of Leadership, with emphasis on Principles and Techniques of Communications; and the fourth year, an experiment in Liberal Education with emphasis on Freedom and Authority and The Individual and Society.

In the afternoons you will choose from five workshops and stick to one for the week. For locals sending more than one member, it is desirable to split up for these sessions in order to enlarge your group's participation in the program.

This notebook has been prepared for assistance to you now and later. In the front are a map of the campus and information on meetings, housing, meals, and recreation.

While you're here, stop in at the Institute of Labor and Industrial Relations. It is on the second floor at 704 South Sixth Street, just south of Green Street one block west of the Union Building, No. 69 on your map. We will be glad to show you around the offices, including the Institute library, where you can look at our collection of labor papers, steward's handbooks, books on labor-management relations, and other material. Ask for our List of Publications so you can choose several of our booklets to take home with you.

WELCOME TO THE UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS. We hope that your stay here will be educational and enjoyable.

Learning and Labor

The Institute of Labor and Industrial Relations was established at the University of Illinois in 1946 to "inquire faithfully, honestly, and impartially into labor-management problems of all types, and secure the facts which will lay the foundation for future progress in the whole field of labor relations."

The Institute seeks to serve all people of the state by promoting general understanding of our social and economic problems, as well as by providing specific services to groups directly concerned with labor and industrial relations.

Implementing this aim, the Institute program includes advanced student training, research, extension and information services.

This Summer School is part of the extension program, which also includes classes, conferences, and other educational projects carried on all over the state during the year.

FREEDOM AND AUTHORITY

THE INDIVIDUAL AND SOCIETY

Discussion Questions

Session 1

FREEDOM AND AUTHORITY IN MODERN SOCIETY

I. The Declaration of Independence: Document 1.

A. Background of this document.
B. What are "self-evident" truths? What is meant by "self-evident"?
C. Are all men created equal? Are they equally tall, equally fair, equally strong? In what ways do you think they are equal?
D. What are "unalienable rights"? Are there any limits, in practice, to your right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness? Are these limits just? What about your right to work?
E. How do the writers of the Declaration justify the act of rebellion? Why do they feel it necessary to do so?
F. If government rests on the consent of the governed, why should you obey laws that you don't agree with (e.g., prohibition, income tax, gambling)?

II. Abraham Lincoln: Document 2.

A. What events was Lincoln referring to? Who is the sheep? Who is the wolf?
B. What is the wolf's argument? Was he right?
C. What is Lincoln's point about the word "liberty"? Can there be liberty without some authority?

III. General Discussion.

A. What things are you free to do? What things are you not free to do?
B. Abalone steak is a seafood found only on the Pacific Coast. Are you free to eat abalone steak?
C. Are you free to work anywhere you see fit? Anytime?
D. What limits should be maintained on freedom?

1. The "spite fence" case: Mr. "A" gets into a fight with his neighbor, "B". "A" decides to build a fence, three stories high, in such a fashion that it cuts off the sunlight to "B's" house. "A" built the fence on his own property which resulted in "B's" complaining. Should "A" have been permitted to build his "spite fence"? How free should people be to use their own property as they see fit?
2. Many people go to quack doctors and are harming themselves by so doing. Should they be free to do so or should quack medicine be prohibited? What about the use of marijuana, liquor, cigarettes or heroin? Should people be free to harm themselves?
3. The Mormons used to practice polygamy which they justified from the Bible. They were punished for this practice and it was prohibited. How do you feel about this?

E. Can you make a general statement about the extent and limits of freedom in modern society?
F. Why value freedom at all?

Discussion Questions

Session 2

THE INDIVIDUAL AND SOCIETY

I. Adam Smith: Document 1.

A. What does Smith think is the effect of an occupation on the ways in which people think? Do you agree--is there any connection between the occupation a man has and the way he thinks about things? How about people who work in factories--do you think their view of the world about them has any connection with the kind of work they do as compared, for example, with a doctor or lawyer or professor?

B. Smith thinks that laborers make poor soldiers. Why did he think so? What do people need to be good soldiers and how do you best prepare them?

(NOTE: This is part of general discussion of the costs of the division of labor. Smith here asserts that specialization is necessary if the economy is to progress. However, in this section, he examines the harmful effects of the division of labor, one of which is the mental effects.)

C. You must remember that the worker usually worked 12-14 hours a day, seven days a week, in Smith's time. We have much more leisure now. Even so, what do you think is the effect of factory work on what a man wants to do after work?

II. Adam Smith: Document 2.

A. Is Smith in agreement with the Declaration of Independence? Would Smith agree that all men are created equal? How can you reconcile this with his view that people in different occupations are very different in their taste and habits and desires?

B. How much can you account for differences between people by differences in their biological inheritance? Take the problem of polygamy we discussed yesterday. Why do you think some people practice it and other find it foolish, immoral, expensive or exhausting?

C. What is the difference between the "individual" and the "society"?

III. Park and Burgess: Document 3.

A. What do these authors mean by the word "human"? In what ways are men different from animals? In what ways are they the same? Do Park and Burgess think that the traits of human beings would develop in complete isolation from other persons? Suppose a child were raised without any human contact whatsoever. What characteristics do you think he would have?

B. What is self-consciousness? Why does it seem to be a human trait?

C. What do these authors mean by "convention"? What actions of yours are conventional? What are not (e.g., breathing vs. speech)?

D. Considering Brave New World, how do you explain the differences between the Newworlders' and our own customs, beliefs and morals?

1. The conditioning process--but aren't we also conditioned?

Discussion Questions

Session 3

THE ORGANIZATIONS--ITS ANATOMY AND EFFECTS

I. Michels, "The Iron Law of Oligarchy": Document 1.

A. What is Michels saying here? What point is he trying to make?

1. Any group that wants to get something done has to have some kind of organization.
2. The moment you have an organization, you have to have some kind or leadership--the organization can't be run by all the members.
3. When you have leaders, you also have rank and file members and this leads to differences between them. Leaders develop certain skills which members don't have and thereby accumulate certain powers.
4. Leaders get rights to do some things that others don't have. For example, the power to make appointments; the right to super-seniority.
5. Since many of the members are relatively apathetic in the first place, they let the leaders do the work and this increases the skills and power of the leaders which they want to hang onto.
6. The leaders then come to enjoy their position and to use their position in the organization to further their own personal aims--some of which are not necessarily the organization's.
7. All of this is unavoidable in a democratic organization, and yet represents the most serious threat with which democracy is faced.

B. What do you think of this analysis? Is there anything in the experience you've had either as a union member or member of some other organization that leads you to agree? To disagree?

C. Almost all union leaders complain that nobody comes to meetings and that very few want to be active. What do you think is the cause of this?

D. Some of you were members of the union before the 1940's. Were things in your union different than they are now? In what way? How do you explain the changes?

E. Is it possible to maintain your freedom and still be part of a large, powerful organization? Does the fact of your membership in your union put any limits on your freedom as a worker or employee?

F. Can you imagine a union functioning without officers? If some people have more authority to decide questions affecting the lives of others, doesn't this limit the freedom of the others?

G. How can an organization be representative and still be large and powerful? What does Michels say about this?

H. Suppose that by some miracle, everybody in the union was just as active as everybody else. Do you think this would make your union stronger? Weaker?

I. What gives the Steelworkers' Union the strength it has in the current strike?

II. Whyte, "The Organization Man": Document 2.

A. What is Whyte's basic point here?
B. What does Whyte mean when he says that to deny that there is a conflict between the individual and the society is to be "soft-minded"?
C. Do you agree with Whyte's basic point that organization itself is not to blame but that the trouble is that we have come to admire it too much?
D. How does Whyte's position on this question of organization compare with Michels'? What position do you take?
E. What ways can you think of to have both a strong organization and effective participation?

Discussion Questions

Session 4

DEMOCRACY AND EFFICIENCY

I. The case of the coal miners: Document 4.

A. What is the issue here as Lewis poses it?
B. Would you pose the issue the same way?
C. Are elected officers necessarily better than appointed ones? Have you ever seen good men not elected and bad ones elected?
D. Is there necessarily a conflict between trying to maximize democracy in an organization and trying to get things done in the most efficient manner?
E. How do you think the coal miners themselves react to Lewis' argument?
F. If you had the choice between building the most democratic union possible and the most efficient union which gets the most for its members, which would you take?

II. John S. Mill: Document 1.

A. What is Mill's argument here? Would he agree with Lewis?
B. Do you think that factions make members more interested in the union?

(NOTE: Discuss other selections under this heading as time permits.)

Discussion Questions

Session 5

FREEDOM AND AUTHORITY AGAIN

I. George Baer: Document 1.

A. Have you ever run into this point of view?
B. What do you think of it?

C. Why do you think the rights of the working man won't be protected by the "boss"?
D. What about the argument that is made nowadays in some places that the rights of the working man (union member) aren't protected by the "Union bosses" either?

II. Mr. Dooley: Document 2.

A. What's funny about this?
B. Is the worker free to quit if he doesn't like his job?
C. Wouldn't a union and union members be entirely free without strikes, rules, contracts, scales, by-laws, etc.?

III. Brave New World.

A. Suppose an angel visited earth and offered us the use of a powerful new invention which would bring great pleasure, enable us to move from place to place in one-tenth the present time, and with much less expenditure of energy, that would create hundreds of thousands of new jobs and even some new industries, but that in return we would have to kill or main about 5,000 people a year to get the use of the invention. Should we do it? (the automobile)

IV. The Problem Again.

Without society and organization, the attainment of our desires and goals would be difficult, if not impossible. With organization, individual freedom is curtailed. How can these be reconciled?

Instructor's discussion outline for use of Aldous Huxley's

BRAVE NEW WORLD

A. The Brave New World (An imagined world of stability and material comforts.):

1. Order and authority have replaced liberty.
2. Comfort has replaced challenge.

B. A social satire:

1. A "take-off" on modern society.
2. An exaggeration as a device to make us consider the impact of our own present way of doing things and to make us consider one man's idea of where we are going.

C. Huxley - some background on the man.

D. Structure of the novel:

1. Description of the society.
2. The "disaffected" persons: Bernard Marx and Helmholtz Watson.
3. The trip to New Mexico:
   Lenina - an example of the pneumatic bliss of the Brave New World
   Linda - "mother"
   John Savage - the representative of the "old" world
4. The conflict between the New World (Lenina, Mustapha Mond) and the old world (John Savage).

E. Questions for discussion:

1. How possible is this world?
2. Would you like to live in it?
3. What do you like about it? What don't you like about it?
4. Are the people happy? Is this an argument for it?
5. What is the argument between Mustapha Mond and John Savage? Who is right?
6. What do you see in modern America which suggests some kind of Brave New World?

(NOTE: You can omit the following parts of the book (paperback edition) if you are pressed for enough reading time:

pp. 38-42; 63-71; 82-102; 116-119; 120-125; 164-177.

Instructor's discussion questions
Based on Brave New World,

Chapters 1-3

A. Would you like to live in B.N.W.? Why? Why not?

B. What seems startling about it? What seems most different from our world?

1. Technology? - artificial reproduction; thought conditioning; "feelies"; soma tablets.
2. Values? - class differences; lack of family; of religion; promiscuity; free use of drugs.

C. How are the technological devices used? For what purposes are they used?

1. The motto of the opening paragraph - "Community, Identity, Stability."
   Community - everyone belongs to everyone else.
   Identity - the reproductive processes produce similar people.
   Stability - a very elementary class consciousness; no class conflict.

D. Why do the Newworlders object to the following:

1. Family life? (because emotions are disturbing?)
2. Freedom from use of drugs? (because people would stay unhappy if they couldn't use drugs and in the BNW nobody is unhappy?)
3. Chastity or fidelity? (because our system of courtship and marriage and our ideas about sex and love promote jealousy?)

E. In Lenina Crowne and Bernard Marx we are introduced to two characters. What ideas do you think they represent? What models or symbols of BNW life do they represent?

1. Lenina - the adjusted girl (and Henry Foster - the adjusted man).
2. Marx - the unadjusted: he likes to be alone; he doesn't like to play "obstacle golf," for example.

F. Can you imagine any fights about anything in B.N.W.? Or any frustrations by anybody about anything? Isn't it a perfect society? If not, what's missing?

G. The conditioning process:

1. Related behavior to the social needs of the society; e.g., consumption of transportation and hatred of flowers.
2. People like to do what they "have to do."
3. People are biologically fitted to their jobs; e.g., embryos destined to be steelworkers are conditioned to love heat from their beginnings in a test tube.

H. Is this such an impossible world? Are we moving toward it? What does Huxley seem to think? (Example: why does Huxley keep referring to Our Ford? To A.F. 632? Why is Ford the God of B.N.W.?)

NOTE: This last question is a good point to begin the discussion of satire and the method to be used in reading the book.

Instructor's discussion questions
Based on Brave New World,

Chapters 4-10

A. Are the Newworlders free? Free from pain, frustration, etc., but are they really free? (Refer to discussion between Marx and Lenina, Chapter 6.)

B. Why is Bernard Marx seen as so strange? What is his "crime"?

C. What is strange about Linda? About John Savage? What do they do for the plot that Huxley is developing? Why have them in the story?

D. What problem appears to have developed by now?
Lenina and Bernard
John Savage

E. Bernard Marx and Helmholtz Watson: the crime of being unorthodox.

1. Why does unorthodoxy threaten stability?
2. Do you know any eccentric people? What should be done with them?

F. Conditioning: what is it in the B.N.W.?

1. Is the B.N.W. type of conditioning really so far-fetched?
2. What kinds of "conditioning" are we exposed to in modern U.S.?

FREEDOM AND AUTHORITY IN MODERN SOCIETY

Document 1.

We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. That, whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness. Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience hath shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government, and to provide new guards for their future security. Such has been the patient sufferance of these colonies; and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former systems of government. The history of the present king of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these states. To prove this, let facts be submitted to a candid world.

He has refused his assent to laws, the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.

He has forbidden his governors to pass laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his assent should be obtained; and, when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them.

He has refused to pass other laws for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of representation in the legislature, a right inestimable to them and formidable to tyrants only.

He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their public records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.

He has dissolved representative houses repeatedly, for opposing with manly firmness his invasions on the rights of the people.

He has refused for a long time, after such dissolutions, to cause others to be elected; whereby the legislative powers, incapable of annihilation, have returned to the people at large for their exercise; the state remaining in the meantime exposed to all the dangers of invasion from without, and convulsions within.

He has endeavored to prevent the population of these states; for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners, refusing to pass others to encourage their migration hither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands.

He has obstructed the administration of justice by refusing his assent to laws for establishing judiciary powers.

He has made judges dependent on his will alone, for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries.

He has erected a multitude of new offices, and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people, and eat out their substance.

He has kept among us, in times of peace, standing armies, without the consent of our legislatures.

He has affected to render the military independent of, and superior to, the civil power.

He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution and unacknowledged by our laws, giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation:

For quartering large bodies of armed troops among us;

For protecting them, by a mock trial, from punishment for any murders which they should commit on the inhabitants of these states;

For cutting off our trade with all parts of the world;

For imposing taxes on us without our consent;

For depriving us, in many cases, of the benefits of trial by jury;

For transporting us beyond seas to be tried for pretended offenses;

For abolishing the free system of English laws in a neighboring province, establishing therein an arbitrary government, and enlarging its boundaries so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these colonies;

For taking away our charters, abolishing our most valuable laws, and altering fundamentally the forms of our governments;

For suspending our own legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.

He has abdicated government here, by declaring us out of his protection and waging war against us.

He has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burned our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people.

He is at this time transporting large armies of foreign mercenaries to complete the works of death, desolation, and tyranny, already begun with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the head of a civilized nation.

He has constrained our fellow-citizens taken captive on the high seas to bear arms against their country, to become the executioners of their friends and brethren, or to fall themselves by their hands.

He has excited domestic insurrections amongst us, and has endeavored to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers, the merciless Indian savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes, and conditions.

In every stage of these oppressions we have petitioned for redress in the most humble terms: Our repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated injury. A prince, whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant is unfit to be the ruler of a free people.

Document 2.

Abraham Lincoln (1864):

"The world has never had a good definition of the word 'liberty,' and the American people just now are much in want of one. We all declare for liberty; but in using the same word, we do not all mean the same thing. With some, the word 'liberty' may mean for each man to do as he pleases with himself and the product of his labor; while with others, the same word may mean for some men to do as they please with other men and the product of other men's labor. Here are two, not only different, but incompatible things, called by the same name,--liberty. And it follows that each of the things is, by the respective parties, called by two different and incompatible names,--liberty and tyranny.

"The shepherd drives the wolf from the sheep's throat, for which the sheep thanks the shepherd as his liberator, while the wolf denounces him for the same act as the destroyer of liberty, especially as the sheep was a black one. Plainly, the wolf and the sheep are not agreed upon the definition of the word 'liberty'; and precisely the same difference prevails today, among us human creatures, even in the North, and all professing to love liberty. Hence we behold the process by which thousands are daily passing from under the yoke of bondage hailed by some as the advance of liberty and bewailed by others as the destruction of all liberty."--From an address at a Fair in Baltimore, April 18, 1864. Printed in Hastings and Thompson, Selections from the Works of Abraham Lincoln, pp. 209-10.

Session 2

THE INDIVIDUAL IN MODERN SOCIETY

Document 1.

Adam Smith:

"In the progress of the division of labor, the employment of the far greater part of those who live by labor, that is, of the great body of the people, comes to be confined to a few very simple operations, frequently to one or two. But the understandings of the greater part of men are necessarily formed by their ordinary employments. The man whose whole life is spent in performing a few simple operations, of which the effects too are, perhaps, always the same, or very nearly the same, has no occasion to exert his understanding, or to exercise his invention in finding out expedients for removing difficulties which never occur. He naturally loses, therefore, the habit of such exertion, and generally becomes as stupid and ignorant as it is possible for a human creature to become. The torpor of his mind renders him, not only incapable of relishing or bearing a part in any rational conversation, but of conceiving any generous, noble, or tender sentiment, and consequently of forming any just judgment concerning many even of the ordinary duties of private life. Of the great and extensive interests of his country he is altogether incapable of judging; and unless very particular pains have been taken to render him otherwise, he is equally incapable of defending his country in war. The uniformity of his stationary life naturally corrupts the courage of his mind, and makes him regard with abhorence the irregular, uncertain, and adventurous life of a soldier. It corrupts even the activity of his body, and renders him incapable of exerting his strength with vigor and perseverance, in any other employment than that to which he has been bred. His dexterity at his own particular trade seems, in this manner, to be acquired at the expence of his intellectual, social, and martial virtues. But in every improved and civilized society this is the state into which the laboring poor, that is the great body of the people, must necessarily fall, unless government takes some pains to prevent it."--Wealth of Nations, Book V, chap. i, sec. 3, art. 2d.

Document 2.

"The difference of natural talents in different men is, in reality, much less than we are aware of; and the very different genius which appears to distinguish men of different professions, when grown to maturity, is not upon many occasions so much the cause as the effect of the division of labour. The difference between the most dissimilar characters, between a philosopher and a common porter, for example, seems to arise not so much from nature as from habit, custom and education. When they came into the world, and for the first six or eight years of their existence, they were perhaps very much alike, and neither their parents nor playfellows could perceive any remarkable difference. About that age, or soon after, they came to be employed in different occupations. This difference of talents comes then to be taken notice of, and widens by degrees, till at last the vanity of the philosopher is willing to acknowledge scarce any resemblance. But without the disposition to truck, barter and exchange, every man must have procured to himself every necessary and conveniency of life which he wanted. All must have had the same duties to perform, and the same work to do, and there could have been no such difference of employment as could alone give occasion to any great difference of talent. . . . As it is the power of exchanging that gives occasion to the division of labour, so the extent of this division must always be limited by the extent of that power, or, in other words, by the extent of the market. . . . There are some sorts of industry, even of the lowest kind, which can be carried on nowhere but in a great town."--Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, pp. 28-29.

Document 3.

"Man is not born human. It is only slowly and laboriously, in fruitful contact, co-operation, and conflict with his fellows, that he attains the distinctive qualities of human nature."--R. E. Park and E. W. Burgess, Introduction to the Science of Sociology, p. 79.

"One thing which seems to distinguish man from the brute is self-consciousness. . . . Human beings, so far as we have yet been able to learn, are the only creatures who habitually pass judgment upon their own actions, or who think of them as right or wrong. . . . There is, in all distinctively human activities, a conventional, one might almost say a contractual, element which is absent in action of other animals."--R. E. Park and E. W. Burgess, Introduction to the Science of Sociology, pp. 190-91.

THE ORGANIZATIONS -- ITS ANATOMY AND EFFECTS

Document 1.

THE "IRON LAW" OF OLIGARCHY

A summary and interpretation of Political Parties: A Sociological Study of the Oligarchical Tendencies of Modern Democracy by Robert Michels (Glencoe, Ill.: The Free Press, 1949). First published in English in 1915. Quoted material used by permission of The Free Press.

"Who says organization says oligarchy." With these words the German political sociologist, Robert Michels (1876-1936), summed up his famous "iron law of oligarchy." Although his "law" is stated in unqualified form, Michels' analysis showed not that organization alone leads to oligarchy (the control by a few), but rather that certain kinds of organization have that tendency, and then only when certain additional processes are at work. The study was based mainly on the history of socialist and trade-union organizations in Europe before the first World War.

His influential book attempts to trace a connection between the basic necessities of organization and the evolution of self-perpetuating oligarchies. Following Michels' argument, we shall first consider the general need for organization and then the special circumstances that make for the drift to oligarchy.

The Need for Organization

1. Democratic action, like any action that strives for definite ends, requires organization. In any group, especially in one where disciplined action is required, there is a division of labor. This simple, fairly obvious statement is the starting point of the argument.

2. Organized, concerted action requires the delegation of special tasks, responsibilities, and powers to a few leaders. This is a special phase of the division of labor. No organization of any size or duration can exist without leaders. Someone has to organize meetings or determine the consensus of opinion, represent the group and its decisions to other organizations or the public, and make the countless small and large decisions that are necessary to carry out its aims.

The degree of organization and the importance of leadership vary with the size of the group, the permanence of its aims, and the complexity of the organization. In a small undifferentiated group leadership may be but weakly developed; leaders arise spontaneously and serve temporarily, unofficially, and without many rewards. The leaders remain members of the group, sharing its interests and influenced by the same social conditions as the members. Since the group is small, all or most members may participate in decisions and actions. The delegated authority is limited and temporary and may be exercised by any member.

The mere fact of organization, that is, the division of labor generally and delegation of tasks and powers to leaders, is not in itself undemocratic. The conditions that give rise to oligarchy have not yet been stated. Michels develops his thesis in the additional processes that can be expected once this division of labor has been established.

Conditions Making for Oligarchy

1. The delegation of tasks and powers to leaders results in a concentration of skills and informal prerogatives in their hands. Not all members can perform the tasks of leadership in complex organizations. The jobs become specialized and require experience, knowledge, and individual aptitude.

a. Administrative skills are required to keep the organization functioning and to get things done. Relations with the outside world, such as diplomacy, collective bargaining, or public relations, require technical skills that the leaders alone possess. Their skills set them apart from the rank and file, and social differentiation begins. This specialization makes the members dependent on the leaders in office, because they are the ones who can keep things going and get things done that further the aims of the group. The dependence of the rank and file --a central theme in Michels' work--makes the leaders indispensable and hence gives them increased power.

b. Leadership carries prerogatives. When he chooses the organization's staff, the leader can select men whose first loyalty is to him. Thus personal machines are built. Leaders also control the channels of information within an organization, and their control gives them special access to and influence over the opinions of the members. These prerogatives and similar opportunities that characterize the social position of leadership tend to make leaders independent of the rank and file, and the power inherent in the concentration of skills is consolidated.

2. The position of leaders is strengthened by the members' political indifference and by their sense of obligation to those who guide them and do the main work. The ordinary member does not have the inclination or time to participate in the demanding, complex tasks of an organization, and he is glad to have the work done by someone else. Moreover, he recognizes his own incompetence compared with the skills of his leaders. The rank and file then submit willingly rather than reluctantly to the widening power of the officials.

3. The concentration of skills and prerogatives in the leaders' hands and the willing submission of the rank and file create opportunities for the self-perpetuation of the leaders. It is not surprising that they take advantage of this and try to stay in office. Michels holds that leaders try to keep their power because it is inherent in human nature to seek power and retain it. "The desire to dominate, for good or for evil, is universal." (Michels, p. 206) This is a dubious and unnecessary assumption, and perhaps Michels' weakest point.

He gives other more acceptable reasons for the self-perpetuation of leaders. Certainly leaders have a desire for personal security, and the prerogatives of leadership give them a social status distinct from the ordinary members. They wish to retain their status and prerogatives, including the accustomed way of living and type of employment. The union official resists returning to the shop. Leaders may also believe sincerely that they are serving the best interests of the organization and that a threat to them is a threat to the group as a whole.

4. Self-perpetuation of leaders tends toward subversion of the aims of the organization. If leaders are independent of rank and file control, there is a temptation to use the organizational machinery and power to further personal aims, a condition which results from the absence of effective democratic control. There is a divergence of interest between the leaders and the led, and leaders follow policies that may not serve the aims for which the group was organized.

Because he was studying social reform movements, Michels was especially interested in the subversion that comes from the conservatism of oligarchic leadership; the objective of stability and security for the organization (and for the leaders) is put above all other action aims. Action is slow and cautious, risks are minimized, powerful enemies are placated, and aims are modified to assure stability. There was a strong tendency among the trade-unions of Europe to move from revolutionary to more conservative aims once they had achieved extensive membership, financial security, and discipline. Organization was necessary for the achievement of the original goals, and it introduced new interests that modified group aims.

5. Oligarchy is inherent in democracy and cannot be eliminated. Michels holds that the social differentiation between leaders and led is universal. This does not mean that tyranny abounds everywhere but that there is a predisposition to oligarchy which requires definite social checks. "Nothing but a serene and frank examination of the oligarchical dangers of democracy will enable us to minimize these dangers, even though they can never be entirely avoided." (Michels, p. 408)

To minimize the dangers, it is necessary to capitalize on a counter-tendency of democracy to stimulate and strengthen the individual's aptitude for criticism and control. "This predisposition towards free inquiry, in which we cannot fail to recognize one of the most precious factors of civilization, will gradually increase in proportion as the economic status of the masses undergoes improvement and becomes more stable, and in proportion as they are admitted more effectively to the advantages of civilization. A wider education involves an increasing capacity for exercising control. Can we not observe every day that among the well-to-do the authority of the leaders over the led, extensive though it be, is never so unrestricted as in the case of the leaders of the poor?...It is, consequently, the great task of social education to raise the intellectual level of the masses, so that they may be enabled, within the limits of what is possible, to counteract the oligarchical tendencies of the working-class movement." (Michels, pp. 406 f.)

The fault is not in organization, in short; it is in our worship of it. It is in our vain quest for a utopian equilibrium, which would be horrible if it ever did come to pass; it is in the soft-minded denial that there is a conflict between the individual and society. There must always be, and it is the price of being an individual that he must face these conflicts. He cannot evade them, and in seeking an ethic that offers a spurious peace of mind, thus does he tyrannize himself.

There are only a few times in organization life when he can wrench his destiny into his own hands--and if he does not fight then, he will make a surrender that will later mock him. But when is that time? Will he know the time when he sees it? By what standards is he to judge? He does feel an obligation to the group; he does sense moral constraints on his free will. If he goes against the group, is he being courageous--or just stubborn? Helpful--or selfish? Is he, as he so often wonders, right after all? It is in the resolution of a multitude of such dilemmas, I submit, that the real issue of individualism lies today.--William H. Whyte, Jr., The Organization Man, pp. 14-15.

DEMOCRACY VERSUS EFFICIENCY

Document 1.

FOR DISCUSSION:

"In many cases, though individuals may not do a particular thing so well, on the average, as the officers of government, it is nevertheless desirable that it should be done by them rather than by the government, as a means to their own mental education."--J. S. Mill, Essay on Liberty.

"The worth of a state in the long run is the worth of the individuals composing it; and a state which postpones the interests of their mental expansion and elevation to a little more of administrative skill. . . . a state which dwarfs its men in order that they may be more docile instruments in its hands even for beneficial purposes--will find that with small men no great thing can really be accomplished."--J.S. Mill, Essay on Liberty.

Hermann Goering:

"In the old parliament, Authority and Responsibility were in reverse order. Responsibility went from top to bottom, and Authority went from bottom to top. That was a sin against natural law. . . . Here, however, the old principle holds good: Authority goes from top to bottom, but responsibility always always from bottom to top. Each is responsible to him who is called to stand next above him. The Leader carries final Responsibility. What the Leader wants will be done. His will is law for us."--September 15, 1935.

Jose Ortega y Gasset:

"Democracy and liberalism are two answers to two completely different questions. Democracy answers this question--'Who ought to exercise the public power?' The answer it gives is--the exercise of public power belongs to the citizens as a body. . . .

"Liberalism, on the other hand, answers this other question--'Regardless of who exercises the public power, what should its limits be?' The answer it gives is--'Whether the public power is exercised by an autocrat or by the people, it cannot be absolute; the individual has rights which are over and above any interference by the State.' This, then, tends to limit the intervention of the public power.

"It is possible to be very liberal, and not at all democratic, or very democratic and not at all liberal."--Invertebrate Spain.

"If the lesser mind could measure the greater as a foot rule can measure a pyramid, there would be finality in universal suffrage. As it is, the political problem remains unsolved."--G. B. Shaw.

"I do not quite understand the democratic theory that by multiplying ignorant opinions indefinitely you produce wisdom." --B. Webb.

At successive UMWA conventions proposals for restoring autonomy, supported by a sizable number of locals, have nevertheless been defeated by substantial majorities. In the various debates on the issue Lewis has taken a prominent part, opposing the restoration of autonomy on the ground that efficiency would thereby be lost. In a typical speech, at the 1936 convention, Lewis denied that district self-government was a question of principle:

> I trust that the Convention, in considering this matter (autonomy) will consider it for what it is really worth and what it means to the Organization. It is not a fundamental principle that the Convention is discussing. It is a question of business expediency and administrative policy as affecting certain geographical areas of the Organization. It is a question of whether you desire your Organization to be the most effective instrumentality within the realm of possibility for a labor organization or whether you prefer to sacrifice the efficiency of your organization in some respects for a little more academic freedom in the selection of some local representatives in a number of districts. These are the issues which are involved.

Lewis has also argued that elected officers are not necessarily good and that the International Executive Board is better qualified than the members to determine what is good for them. Thus, during debate at the 1948 convention Lewis defended his power to appoint officers:

> The Organization is a business administration and I doubt that it is advisable to spend our time in the self-examination of mere details. . . If any of our officers don't do the right thing, you know what I do with them, don't you? Some of you ought to know it, because there are a lot of former officers digging coal now that used to be in office, and just because they didn't do the right thing they are not in office now. . .

He has constantly asserted that the union has achieved its current strength and effective bargaining position under the policy of provisionalism.--Bernard Karsh and Jack London, "The Coal Miners, A Study of Union Control," Quarterly Journal of Economics, p. 419.

FREEDOM AND AUTHORITY -- THE PROBLEM RECAST

Document 1.

George Baer--President of the Philadelphia & Reading RR to Stockholder who wrote about 1902 Anthracite strike.

"Dear Mr. Clark: I have your letter of the 16th. I do not know who you are. I see that you are a religious man; but you are evidently biased in favor of the right of working men to control a business in which he has no other interest than to secure fair wages. I beg of you not to be discouraged. The rights and interests of the laboring man will be protected and cared for - not by labor agitators but by the Christian gentlemen to whom God has given control of the property rights of the country. Pray ernestly that the right may triumph, always remembering that the Lord God omnipotent still reigns and that this reign is one of law and order, not violence and crime."

Mr. Dooley on the Open Shop

F. P. Dunne (1867-1936) was the famous American humorist who as "Mr. Dooley" wrote keen criticism and satire of life in the United States.

"'What's all this that's in the papers about the open shop?' asked Mr. Hennessey.

"'Why, don't ye know?' said Mr. Dooley. 'Really, I'm surprized at yer ignorance, Hinnissey. What is th' open shop? Sure, 'tis where they kape the doors open to accommodate th' constant stream av' min comin' in t' take jobs cheaper than th' min what has th' jobs. 'Tis like this, Hinnissey: Suppose wan av these freeborn citizens is workin' in an open shop f'r th' princely wage av wan large iron dollar a day av tin hour. Along comes anither son-av-gun and he sez t' th' boss, "Oi think Oi could handle th' job nicely f'r ninety cints." "Sure," sez th' boss, and th' wan dollar man gets out into th' crool woruld t' exercise hiz inalienable roights as a freeborn American citizen an' scab on some other poor devil. An' so it goes on, Hinnissey. An' who gits th' benefit? Thrue, it saves th' boss money, but he don't care no more f'r money thin he does his right eye.

"'It's all principle wid him. He hates t' see men robbed av their indipindence. They must have their indipindence regardless av anything else.'

"'But,' said Mr. Hennessey, 'these open-shop min ye menshun say they are f'r unions if properly conducted.'

"'Shure,' said Mr. Dooley, 'if properly conducted. An' there we are: an' how would they have them conducted? No strikes, no rules, no contracts, no scales, hardly iny wages, an' dam' few mimbers.'"

AUTOMATION AND EMPLOYMENT

School for Workers
University of Wisconsin

July, 1964

UNIT I. EMPLOYMENT AND THE LABOR FORCE

---

a. Characteristics of the labor force

1. Distribution, by industry (Table 1)

2. Relative growth rates, 1940-1960 (Table 2)

   --By industry

   --By occupational classifications

3. Factors influencing shifting employment patterns; impact upon the unions

b. Labor Force projections:

1. Unemployment, 1929-1963 (Table 3)

2. Characteristics of unemployed workers, 1964

3. Factors which have helped prevent large-scale unemployment: Social security, unemployment compensation, pension plans, supplementary unemployment benefits, welfare payments, other forms of compensatory spending (plus government spending in general)

4. Problems associated with labor force projections:

   --rapid populations growth, plus lower attrition rates and increased longevity

   --increasing productivity; a rate of increase faster than most observers had predicted or anticipated

   --a technological revolution (discussion of this will come later)

   --a decline in the number of unskilled jobs which can be filled adequately by less skilled, less educated workers

   --a gap between technical advances and educational achievement (further contributing to the job problem)

   --minority group problems, many of which are closely related to problems raised above

Employment and the labor force (continued)

c. Suggested techniques for dealing with problems associated with changing character of the job market:

1. Better education, across-the-board

2. Manpower re-training, on a whole-hearted and rational basis

3. Removal of impediments to mobility (e.g., vested pension plans, methods to protect seniority rights, etc.)

4. Better counseling services for persons who have not yet entered the labor market

5. An improved employment service

6. Monetary allowances to make re-training and re-location possible; removal of the financial burden associated with job changes (extended unemployment compensation, severance pay, re-location allowances, etc.), so that dislocated workers will not have to bear the entire social cost of job changes and mobility

7. An effective program against job discrimination based on age, color, sex, race, creed, religion, etc., so that the groups now experiencing the greatest amount of difficulty finding employment can compete on a equal footing with groups that have not suffered from discrimination.

UNIT II. AUTOMATION: ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND POLITICAL IMPLICATIONS

---

a. The meaning of automation:

1. Selected definitions

2. Examples, (industrial applications; data processing; computer technology)

3. The distinction between "automation," and other forms of technological advances

b. The impact of automation - realized and potential:

Upon employment

--Observed changes in labor force (white collar versus blue collar; increased number of technicians, scientific and related kinds of workers)

--Creation of new jobs, (example: data processor), elimination of old (file clerks and railroad firemen)

--Elimination of many repetitive kinds of jobs, which lend themselves easily and rationally to automation (e.g., the kinds of jobs which might have been available to untrained and/or less skilled persons)

Upon production

--Significant increase in labor/plant productivity; lower unit labor costs; higher quality control standards

c. The significance of rapid technological advances (automation)

1. Higher productivity can - and should - be translated into much higher living standards for most persons, e.g., those who retain their jobs, or who secure the jobs associated with the new technology

2. In many ways, we can look forward to an era of abundance, the likes of which the world has never known

3. The spread of automation should be eagerly anticipated, if we can solve the economic and social problems associated with job displacement. But this will not be easy, because of many ingrained misconceptions, stereotyped thinking patterns, folklores, etc.

Significance of automation (continued)

4. While many economic problems, such as the existence of mass poverty in a society characterized by affluence, remain to be solved, we stand ready to overcome the problems of scarcity which has plagued mankind for centuries.

5. Having said this, can we assume that everyone will share the instructor's enthusiasm for automation?

   What about those persons who are most affected by the insecurity associated with job changes and dislocation?

   Is this the point at which social and political attitudes and values must change?

6. If only those at the bottom of the economic ladder are expected to suffer the undesirable consequences of automation, while those in more favored circumstances are the only gainers - we will increase the disparities between rich and poor which have made us all aware of the critical problems associated with poverty.

7. Herein lies the crisis: of social engineering, and social planing:

   In the long run, the problems of dislocation associated with automation may be solved; but the "long run" may constitute an unendurable span of time for those cut off from the mainstream of economic life.

UNIT III. THE INEVITABILITY OF AUTOMATION

---

1. Why automation?

   a) Every producer or enterprise wants to produce as economically and efficiently as possible, to earn the largest possible margin of profit; to attract new capital; to expand the size of the enterprise, and make it as attractive as possible to stockholders, employees, managers, etc.

   b) In order to achieve maximum effiency, the producer must find the most rational and efficient combination of labor, land, capital equipment, entrepreneurial skills - the factors of production.

   c) Where labor is relatively expensive, the producer will try to subsitute machinery for labor, in the most efficient and profitable combination; where the business is sound (e.g., profitable), and where it is possible to divert retained earnings to plant modernization, the company will do so.

   d) The company wants to remain competitive; with other products, with other manufacturers, and, in some cases, with foreign manufactures.

   e) This is natural, and is the basis for the perpetuation of an enterprise kind of economy, based on private initiative.

   f) As long as the system (and the process of technological innovation) does not result in mass dislocation, or exploitation of workers' health or their economic standards (as happened in the 19th and early 20th century), the role of government is to maintain the essential elements of a free economic system; the job of the union is to protect the interests of its members, viz-a-viz the other factors of production referred to above.

2. What role does government play?

   a) Assuming that the conditions described above are met (e.g., child and women are not exploited, and competitive conditions exist)

   b) Then government has a responsibility to act when stated goals of economic development and full employment are not met by the private sector of the economy.

UNIT IV. WHAT DETERMINES THE LEVEL OF EMPLOYMENT?

---

a. Within the individual firm:

1. The demand for the company's product(s); e.g., how much can it sell?

2. The demand for the products manufactured by the industry of which the firm is a part, and the individual firm's competitive position (e.g., General Motors in relationship to the automobile industry; Republic Steel in relationship to the basic steel industry, etc.)

3. The ratio of labor to machinery, relative to the price and supply of each of these factors; the "skill mix"; the nature of the industry with respect to the use of labor (the petroleum industry is "capital intensive"; it uses a large amount of capital relative to its use of labor; the garment industry is "labor intensive," and it uses a large amount of labor relative to its use of capital

b. Within the total economy:

1. The level of total (aggregate) demand: spending by government, business and consumers

Government	Business	Consumers
general govt. operations	New plants	Physical goods (housing, automobiles, food, clothing, etc.)
Defense	New machinery
Welfare	Plant expansion	Services (recreation, medical and dental care, auto, home and appliance repair, etc.)
Veterans
Agriculture
Debt service

The sum total of the spending listed above equals gross national product; employment levels correspond roughly to the rate at which the Gross National product expands

What determines the level of employment (continued)

2. Factors which influence level of spending:

Government	Business	Consumers
need for government services	demand for its products	level of income (more money income usually means more spending)
level of income (related to business and personal income)	its profit position (will it pay to borrow money?)	psychology (what does the future hold); expectations regarding future income level political decisions and considerations	psychology (e.g., expectations as to the future)	attractiveness of new products
	Condition of plant and equipment

The sum total of these factors, many of which hinge upon the pessimism or optimism of those who make decisions to spend, or not to spend, determines the overall level of economic activity within the total economy

c. Means by which government can influence levels of spending:

1. Monetary policy. Government can make it EASIER or HARDER to borrow money (re-discount rates, federal reserve requirements as to the amount of money member banks must keep on reserve, margin requirements for buying stocks, buying or selling bonds on the open market).

The factors listed above affect the level of interest rates; the interest rate influences decisions to borrow - and hence, to create money. The amount of money in circulation is related to DEBT, since most of our money supply is created by the banks. Our money supply is made up of the following elements:

HAND MONEY, or currency. This is the money issued by and guaranteed by the federal government. It consists of coins, federal reserve notes, silver certificates, etc. This money is backed by the government, and by precious metals such as gold and silver (now totals about $32 billion).

DEMAND DEPOSITS, which is money in banks, largely created by the banks (now totals about $153 billion). Shown on page 8 is a simple example of how money is "created" by the banks:

What determines the level of employment (continued)

BANK A opens its doors for business. It has capital, but no deposits. Its first customer, John Smith, deposits $100. Now the bank has money to lend, and proceeds to do so. In all likelihood, it will lend out most of the money it has on hand. At the end of its first day in business, Bank A's balance sheet might look like this:

Balance Sheet, Bank A

ASSETS		LIABILITIES
Cash	$20	Deposits	$100
Loans	80
	$100		$100

BANK B opens its doors for business on the following day. Its first customer, George N. Debt, deposits $80, which represents a loan from Bank A. Bank B now has $80 in cash; it can lend all of this amount, except what it must keep on reserve (above 20%). As the process repeats itself throughout the banking system, an initial deposit of $100 in cash eventually becomes a far greater amount of money in circulation (roughly 5 times as much).

Thus, the total amount of money in circulation depends upon

*The rate at which money changes hands (velocity)

*Government policy with regard to interest rates ("tight" money versus "easy" credit)

*The willingness of borrowers to go into debt (which in turn is a function of psychology, confidence, expectations, the profitability of operations, etc.)

2. Fiscal policy. Through spending and taxing policies, the federal government can directly affect levels of employment:

--When government taxes more than it spends, surplus, it reduces the amount of money in circulation, holds down employment, etc.

--When government spends more than it receives in the form of taxes (deficit), it must borrow to make up the difference. It borrows from the banks, and creates money.

--If government does not spend (or tax), we would assume no need for compensatory fiscal policy. This raises the question of whether we can have full employment in the absence of government spending.

Older economists (and the present generation of fiscal conservatives) assumed that full employment was inevitable; in fact, classical economists did not even deal with the question of business cycles in any great detail. But we experienced periodic business crises and unemployment; and in the 1930's, the Great Depression produced unemployment equal to 16 million, out of a work force of 49 million.

In large measure, the experience of the 1930's led to the development of the "new" economics, of which John Maynard Keynes was the chief exponent. Basically, his ideas, which to some extent have been translated into public policy in most western nations, are as follows:

i. As a society grows richer, and as individuals consumed less of their total incomes, the gap between income and consumption had to be filled by investment (in new plant, equipment, etc.) in order to maintain a given level of employment.

ii. There could be equilibrium levels of income, consumption and investment which fall below full employment. Keynes advocated compensatory fiscal (spending) policy in such instances, to compensate for the difference between privvate consumption and investment, and the amount of spending needed to produce full employment.

iii. Keynes' ideas were tried, to a limited extent, during the depression of the 1930's. But the second World War came along before the effects of the limited period of compensatory spending could be assessed. In brief, Keynesian policy would call for the following policies:

When inflation threatens: Spend less, tax more (to take money out of circulation)

During periods of underemployment: Spend more, tax less (to create more money, spending, and hence - jobs).

The recent tax cut is an embodiment of these ideas; and so far at least, the Keynesian prescription seems to have produced the desired effect. But the implementation of the policy encountered a great deal of opposition and many opinions which ran counter to the philosophy behind the tax cut: For example,

i. Debt, per se, is bad

ii. Deficit spending is particularly bad, and will lead us to fiscal oblivion

iii. Our children will inherit a huge, burdensome debt

iv. We will spend ourselves into national bankruptcy

The evidence to date does not seem to indicate that any of these propositions is correct, but they are firmly engrained in our economic folklore. And they have impeded effective government action in the economic arena.

Monetary and fiscal policies are the basic weapons which government can employ if it wishes to influence levels of spending, production and employment. In the next section of the course, we shall explore alternative prescriptions for dealing with the problem of automation and unemployment.

UNIT V. EMPLOYMENT AND PUBLIC POLICY

So far, we have dealt with two basic concepts: (1) The meaning of automation, and the implications for employment and production, and (2) the economic role of government. What we really don't know is whether present levels of economic activity could be sustained in the absence of government policy, and in the absence of high levels of government spending (at the local, state and federal level), since government has played a major role in economic affairs since the mid-1930's. Superimposed upon the economic problems we have experienced regarding growth and full employment is the "new technology," commonly known as automation. Now we have to grapple with some of the major policy issues which we might prefer to ignore. Basically, the question is: can we sustain a full employment economy during a period in which major technological changes have produced employment dislocations?

Some of these issues are outlined below:

a. IF an insufficient number of jobs are created in the private sector of the economy, what alternative is there other than remedial fiscal and monetary policy?

b. The labor movement has strongly supported the idea of shorter hours of work. Except for a few isolated instances, there have been relatively few advances on this front. In the past, productivity gains have been translated into fewer hours of work; but there seems to be considerable reluctance, some of it romantic, to reduce hours below 40 per week

c. We must then consider the fate of the "marginal worker," e.g., the person who is thrown out of a job because of automation, plant shutdown, etc., or who cannot find work because of inadequate training, skills, etc. Does society have an obligation to provide employment opportunities for all? What are the alternatives which we can pursue as a matter of policy in the area of employment?

1. The market forces approach. Remove all government controls and impediments, and let the natural forces of the market place restore full employment.

2. Provide a minimum subsistence allowance for persons who cannot find employment, and accept the inevitability of the welfare approach to solving this aspect of the employment problem.

3. Do nothing at all, in the hope that the elimination of subsidy payments will shock the unemployed into action to solve their own problems.

4. Devote a substantial amount of money and effort towards meaningful re-training programs, which will equip workers with skills necessary to compete in a changing labor market.

5. Create jobs in the public sector, if it appears that the private sector is not growing rapidly enough to provide jobs for those seeking employment.

d. With respect to point c(5) above, we have to ask ourselves two basic questions: First can government create jobs intelligently, without waste, and in an efficient manner? Secondly, are there important jobs to be done, which can be accomplished via public employment?

The answer to the first question is not easy. But certainly, with respect to the second question, the answer is a resounding yes. A few examples, which we will discuss in detail, are listed below:

1. The support and improvement of our educational system. With few exceptions, there isn't a school district in the country which wouldn't welcome financial support, more and better teachers, money to expand physical plant and equipment and to purchase better teaching aids. This is particularly true of urban communities, which bear the brunt of teaching children who present the greatest learning problems.

2. The development of modern transportation facilities. This includes highway construction and modernization, the development of urban transit systems, the upgrading of rail and airport facilities, etc., to improve the overall system by which we transport people and products.

3. Water resource development. For many areas of the country, including Wisconsin, this is rapidly becoming a problem of critical importance. If we are unwilling to devote more of our resources to the preservation and improvement of our water resources, adequate water for drinking, irriagation, recreation, industry, etc. will be available only to a fortunate minority of our population.

4. Recreational facilities. Increasing leisure time and money income are placing increasing stresses upon public recreational facilities, particularly in what once was our wilderness areas.

5. Rebuilding our cities. We could spend all of our available resources on this task alone, in order to preserve and enhance the urban areas of our nation, where most of our population lives and works. Almost every city in the country faces critical problems relating to the deterioration of the central city, and increasing pressures of population upon public facilities.

6. Public health. We need more research facilities, more and better hospitals, outpatient treatment centers, mental institutions, medical and nursing schools, etc. We have only begun to reap the benefits of expanding scientific knowledge in the area of public health, and the potential benefits in this frontier of knowledge.

7. Better services at the local level. These include better schools, sanitation, police and fire protection, museums, libraries, theatres, art galleries, parks, etc. Because most cities lack the financial resources to expand these facilities on their own, they will have to rely upon the principle of shared taxes, since a large part of the power to tax has been pre-empted by the federal government.

8. Advanced education. We need to expand our college plant, to provide facilities to everyone who can profit from advanced education. This includes facilities for adult education, to equip workers with the skills needed to compete in the modern labor market, and to understand the society of which they are a part.

Conclusion. We stand on the threshold of an era of abundance. The fulfillment of the promise depends largely on the kind of men who are elected to public office. If they have vision, courage and intelligence, automation should be welcome and applauded. If legislators are hamstrung by the cliches of the 19th century, we face many serious problems. There is reason for optimism. As education expands, it will become harder for "know nothings" to get elected. But the first hurdle will be our ability to think along new lines. This will not be particularly easy to achieve.

Mr. Fred Hoehler
Director of Education
United Steelworkers of America
1500 Commonwealth Building
Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania 15222

Dear Fred:

On a recent trip to Florida I had an opportunity to talk with Estes Riffe, the Steelworkers Assistant Director in that district, about education programs. He and others in the district seem to be quite interested in the possibility of developing a more active labor education program in that area. He told me that Bill Edwards was at that time attending a one-month Institute under your auspices.

This is just a reminder that I would be most happy to co-operate on any of your programs in Florida or elsewhere in the southeast. Although my special interests at this time relate to new perspectives on the South, racial relations, and civil rights, I have found it useful to work with unions on a number of basic union education programs. Before too long I will be sending you a more detailed description of the mainstream of my program here.

Best personal wishes.

May, 1966

Next month our Union celebrates its 30th birthday and it is quite fitting that we have scheduled for next month the first of a series of Educational Conferences to better acquaint our members with their Union. This scheduling of such conferences is in line with the Convention mandate and the action of the International Executive Board whereby it was decided to appoint Educational Coordinators for each District to teach the Local Union Officers, Grievance Committeemen, and all Members who wish to participate, not only the history of the Labor Movement but also the duties of officers, parliamentary procedure, correct handling of grievances, and all other pertinent data that goes to make a successful organization. As you already know, Bill Edwards of our Staff has been designated Educational Coordinator for this District. He has scheduled the first Conference for June 11th and 12th. It will be held in the Aloha Room of the Hawaiian Village Motel, Dale Mabry Avenue, (Route 92, South) Tampa, Florida. Participants in this Conference will be from the areas around Tampa, Central Florida, and Jacksonville. Rates at the Hawaiian Village will be $10.00 single and $14.00 double. Reservations should be made directly with the Motel, mentioning the Steelworkers' Conference. Luncheon will be served to the group at an approximate price of $2.50. The expenses of the delegates to the Conference will, of course, be borne by the Local Unions.

A Conference for the members in South Florida will be held in the Miami area at a date to be designated later.

The second Conference will be held on June 18th and 19th at Loyola University, St. Charles Street, New Orleans, Louisiana. This Conference will be for our members in the Louisiana, Mississippi, and Mobile, Alabama areas. Luncheon will be served to the Delegates in the University Cafeteria, and overnight accomodations for those who need same can best be secured by contacting the New Orleans Office of the Steelworkers. The address is 3308 Tulane Avenue, New Orleans, La., and the telephone number is 822-3380.

I strongly advise that you have as much participation in these Conferences as your Local Union can afford. The problems of automation, combination of jobs, harder bargaining techniques, and the increasingly strong resistance of employers to unionization make it imperative that our Local Union Officers and Committeemen be on their toes at all times in order to do an adequate job for those people who have elected them for that specific purpose.

Your Union has helped to spearhead a movement among the Migrant Workers in Florida which is bound to have a far-reaching and beneficial effect, not only on Labor in Florida, but throughout the Nation. We have been meeting with and assisting in signing up the crew leaders in the migrant labor field, and have been achieving a most remarkable degree of success among these people who have been ill-housed, ill-fed, and exploited in many ways that are brutally shameful in a Country that sponsors aid to the exploited of other countries, Peace Corps, Poverty Programs, and many other facets of the "Great Society" which are needed just as desparately at home as abroad.. The efforts of our people in the "vegetable basket" of South and Central Florida have borne exceptional results, and we are now in the process of turning these people over to the International Laborers' Union of North America. This Union has been assigned the jurisdiction over migrant workers and will finish the job which we helped to start. It has been my feeling for some time that the only way we can raise the standard of living in the Southern States is to do something about those people who not only work for

Background Information

United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO-CLC

4302 Henderson Blvd., Tampa, Florida 33609

Pat Burke, International Representative in charge of District 36-G

STRUCTURE:

The USWA has more than 1,000,000 members in over 3,000 affiliated local unions throughout the United States, Puerto Rico and Canada. It has three top International Officers, a national director of Canada and 29 district directors who comprise a 33-man International Executive Board elected by referendum every four years. This group determines policy between conventions. The supreme legislative body is the biennial International Constitutional Convention held in September of even numbered years.

Membership in local unions is open to all without discrimination. Local union officers, elected by the members, serve for three years.

JURISDICTION:

Generally, union membership is employed in the basic steel and allied ferrous and non-ferrous metals producing and fabricating industries. This includes production and maintenance workers as well as clerical, technical and plant protection employees in ore mining, quarrying, smelting & refining, Great Lakes shipping, rail transport, cement, refractory brick & tile making, primary metal production, foundries, coating & plating operations, the manufacture of structural steel, forgings, extrusions, rolled sheets, pipes, tubes, molds, wires, nails, screws, nuts, bolts, ordnance materials, barrels, cans and other containers, etc.

The union also represents workers in a wide range of other manufacturing industries such as engines, valves, fittings, heating & plumbing equipment, compressors, home appliances, plastics, musical instruments, sporting goods, toys, hardware, machinery, transportation equipment, cutlery, etc.

LABOR CONTRACTS:

Approximately 3,000 contracts are currently in force with about 2,000 employers. Most contracts cover only one plant or one operating unit of the employer, although in some cases several operations may be covered by one basic contract.

In addition to wage rate structures and grievance machinery, contracts negotiated by the USWA have featured liberal pension plans, sick and accident insurance coverage, vacations, Supplementary Unemployment Benefits, three-month paid holidays every five years, and many other fringe benefits. Prior to formation of the union, the basic steel labor rate was 47c an hour; fringe benefits were non-existent.

USWA collective bargaining policy is established by a 163-man International Wage Policy Committee comprised of the 33-man Executive Board and 130 elected members who must be actively employed in industry.

Although most agreements expire close to the termination date of those in basic steel, the USWA is engaged in contract bargaining the year around.

OFFICERS:

I. W. Abel, president. Began first four-year term June 1, 1965. Born August 11, 1908 in Magnolia, O. Began labor career as mill hand in Canton, O., at the American Sheet and Tin Mill Works, now a division of the U. S. Steel Corp. Appointed staff representative of the Steel Workers Organizing Committee (SWOC), predecessor of the USWA, in 1937 by Philip Murray, founder of SWOC and later USWA president. Appointed Director of District 27, Canton area, in February 1942, and elected District 27 director at 1st Constitutional convention of USWA in same year. Elected international secretary-treasurer in 1952 and served in that post until elected president.

Walter J. Burke, secretary-treasurer. Installed in first four-year term on June 1, 1965. Born Sept. 14, 1911 in Antioch, Ill. After serving as assistant instructor of printing at Waukegan, Ill., Township high school, was employed as inspector in the Metal Finishing division of Sanitary Refrigeration Co. in Fond-du-lac, Wis., from 1932-37. Appointed to staff of SWOC in 1937 by Philip Murray. Elected secretary-treasurer of Wisconsin State Union Council (CIO) during service as staff representative. Became director of District 32 (Milwaukee, Wis. area) in 1948. Re-elected as District 32 director until elected international secretary-treasurer.

Joseph P. Molony, vice president. Installed in first four-year term on June 1, 1965. Born on Nov. 6, 1906 in Ireland. One of original founders of SWOC. Worked on the New York, New Haven and Hartford railroad and ore docks at Republic Steel's Buffalo, N. Y., plant. Appointed as SWOC organizer in 1937 by Philip Murray. Spearheaded drive to organize seamen on Great Lakes ore boats. Elected director of USWA District 4 (New York state) at union's 1st Constitutional convention in 1942 and re-elected without opposition to head the district until 1965 when elected international vice president.

HISTORY OF UNION:

The USWA originally grew out of the mass production organizing efforts initiated in 1935 by United Mine Workers' President John L. Lewis and a group of other AFL leaders. They formed the Committee for Industrial Organizations, later the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO).

Under an agreement with the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, Sheet & Tin Workers (organized in 1874), Philip Murray established the Steel Workers Organizing Committee (SWOC) and launched a massive organizing drive throughout the industry in June, 1936 with the assistance of the CIO. The organizing drive was almost an immediate success, surviving many desperate efforts of giant steel companies to thwart unionization of their industry.

Within six years, membership growth and collective bargaining progress led to the formation of an autonomous international union at a constitutional convention held in Cleveland, O. At that time, SWOC was disbanded and the union became the United Steelworkers of America, CIO, on May 19, 1942.

The founding president, Philip Murray, died in November, 1952. He was succeeded by David J. McDonald, originally the secretary-treasurer of the organization.

Upon the merger of the CIO with the AFL in 1955, the USWA became an AFL-CIO affiliate. In Canada, the union is affiliated with the Canadian Labour Congress (CLC).

I. W. Abel became the third president of the USWA by challenging McDonald's leadership in a referendum election held Feb. 9, 1965.

sub-standard wages, but who are even excluded from the minimum wage Law and from all other benefits which a paternal government has given in many cases where the need was great, but has completely neglected to provide in areas where the need is greatest. This situation has been more prevalent in the Southern States than elsewhere, but the most glaring and pitiful examples of starvation wages, want, and exploitation are in the fields of migrant farm labor and this field reaches into all States of the Nation as the cycles for planting and harvesting occur.

Happenings in the District are about as usual with some good and some bad news. Organization is still a paramount issue because we must continue to build our Union for the day we stop doing so is the day that we begin to slowly die. However we are also putting a great deal of emphasis on service for this is also a vital ingredient in the life of a Union, and it is my feeling that our members are entitled to the best of everything that we are able to supply.

As an example of service we had scheduled a Grievance for final arbitration at the Birds Eye Plant in Winter Haven, Florida. The Company maintained that work by the employees in various groves during the cold snap (building smudge fires) was done for the grove owners, which would mean a lower rate of pay. In the final settlement of this Grievance twenty-two (22) employees received back pay for this work including time and one-half pay where applicable.

At the Continental Can Plant in Tampa two grievances were taken to Arbitration. One seven (7) day suspension was expunged from the employee's record and he was made whole for the time lost from work. One discharge penalty was expunged from the employee's record and changed to a thirty day suspension with back pay for time lost after the end of the suspension period.

Negotiations have been completed at the Kaiser Aluminum Norco Works with the employees coming under the basic Kaiser Agreement. Wage increases on an interim rate settlement pending completion of a CWS program ranged from 33¢ per hour to 44½¢ per hour, retroactive to September 2nd, 1965. Retroactive checks ran from $650.00 to $800.00. Committeemen from the plant were Don Brady and Barry Bleakley. The Norco Unit has been amalgamated with Local Union 5702 at Gramercy, La.

Incidentally the boys from Local 5702 really practice Political Action as well as support the International Union in contributions to PAC. Pete Roussel, the Chairman of the Grievance Committee of Local 5702 has been elected as an Alderman for the City of Lutcher, Louisiana.

A fine contract has been signed by Industrial Siderurgica covering the employees who are members of Local Union 6006. The contract for three years gave the employees an unprecedented gain of 33¢ per hour in wages and fringe benefits. Also in Puerto Rico, elections have been won at the plants of Exotic Leather and the Braid Corporation, with a contract being signed at Exotic Leather as well as a new contract being signed at Armco International.

Contracts have also been signed at the plants of Owens-Illinois in Orlando, Florida; and Southern Spring Bed Company in Tampa, Florida.

Negotiations are still under way at the plants of Adams Packing at Auburndale, Florida and the Container Corporation in Orlando, Florida.

A Petition for an Election has been filed for the employees of the Florida Wire & Cable Company of Jacksonville, Florida. The election will be held on Friday, June 3rd, 1966.

Litigation is still going on at the plants of Moore Dry Kiln and Southern Valve, both of Jacksonville, Florida.

Sorry to report that elections have been lost at the plants of Marine Bulk Handling in Mobile, Alabama and Sunbeam Electronics, Inc. in Fort Lauderdale, Florida.

I am also sorry to report that the Mississippi Steel Company and the G & O Manufacturing Company, both of Jackson, Mississippi are still on strike. The courageous employees are fighting all of the prejudice that exists in Mississippi and they certainly deserve any help that your Local Union can give. Their fight is your fight and their final victory will be a victory for the entire Union. They need help - badly.

If you have any Local Union Officers who are not receiving the News Letter please let us know and his name and correct address will be placed on the list. Also IF YOU HAVE ANY NEWS THAT YOU THINK WOULD BE OF INTEREST TO THE DISTRICT, PLEASE SEND IT IN TO THE DISTRICT OFFICE IN TAMPA. We shall be most happy to relay any newsworthy items that are reported to us. Try to have letters in by the 10th.

* * * * * * * * * * * *

In the last two Newsletters I have asked for opinions and comment on the establishment of a Strike Fund for the District. The answers have been varied with about a three to one majority favoring the idea but with greatly diversified ideas of how it should be established. The Canadian contingent of the United Steelworkers of America has come up with the most practical and effective idea at a two day Canadian Policy Conference in Winnipeg a week or two ago. Some three hundred Delegates vetoed the proposed idea of either a District or an all Canadian Strike Fund. Instead the Delegates took a page from the action of the UAW a few years ago and voted overwhelmingly for an International Strike Fund to back up contract bargaining wherever it was needed. The Canadian Conference proposed a dollar ($1.00) a month levy on all Steelworkers, with the entire amount to be earmarked for Strike Relief. The Conference also set up a delegation to try to sell the idea to the American Members at the Convention in Atlantic City next September. Frankly I think that this idea will be the answer to securing more and better contracts, and, I would appreciate having those of you who feel the same way, submit Resolutions to the Atlantic City Convention recommending that such a Strike Fund be set up. It will help secure contracts from individual small companies who resist unions the most and will prevent a constant drain on our treasury.

REMEMBER THAT WE ARE HOPING FOR A REAL TURNOUT AT OUR EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCES. SO THAT PROPER ARRANGEMENTS CAN BE MADE I SUGGEST AGAIN THAT YOU NOTIFY BILL EDWARDS AS TO THE NUMBER FROM YOUR LOCAL UNION WHO WILL ATTEND. THOSE WHO WILL ATTEND IN TAMPA CAN WRITE HIM AT THE TAMPA OFFICE AND THOSE WHO WILL BE IN NEW ORLEANS MAY WRITE HIM THERE.

Dear Mr. Via:

Your letter of May 30th has been turned over to me because of Bill Edwards' absence in Pittsburgh and I have been handling the details of our Conference to be held in Tampa on June 11th and 12th.

Since the agenda for the Conference is somewhat elastic, may I suggest that if you care to do so, we would be glad to have you with us and will try to fit you in somewhere along the line of basic Union courses, steward training, etc. Since this is our first Conference of this type, we are leaving the matter of civil rights, etc., to a later Conference.

The Conference will be held at the Hawaiian Village Motel, North Dale Mabry Highway, Tampa, Florida. Reservations must be made direct and if you mention the Steelworkers' Conference you will receive a special rate. We are leaving the matter of your attendance strictly up to you, but want you to know that if you care to appear, you will be most welcome.

Dear Mr. Edwards:

On a recent Florida trip I talked about labor education programs with Estes Riffe at the time you were attending a month-long staff institute in Pittsburgh. Estes was most enthusiastic about the possibilities of union education work in Florida and the rest of the district and especially in regards to the kind of leadership you will be able to give such efforts.

My own program here at the Southern Regional Council is essentially a labor education undertaking. We are especially concerned with a wide range of problems reflecting a changing South. This means that we give special attention to problems related to racial understanding, civil rights, and the role of unions in the various changes that are under way. On occasion I teach the more basic union courses such as steward training and local union administration with union groups in the southeast. Fred Hoehler in your national office would be able to give you some information on my background and experience.

Estes mentioned a possible program on June 11-12. I would be happy to assist in any way with that program or with subsequent ones which you may develop within the district. Please let me know if I can be of assistance.

Sincerely,

PITTSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA 15222

DATE March 1, 1967

TO: Mr. Leonard Webb

FROM: Fred K. Hoehler, Jr.

SUBJECT:

A recent telephone conversation with Director Weston indicates that, because of the forthcoming local union elections, it has been exceedingly difficult to recruit the proper individuals for the Teacher Training Institute.

He stated that he is most desirous of having this program be a successful one and suggests that we postpone the Institute until late August or early September.

While I want to get this new program started as soon as possible, I realize that its potential success will depend on the calibre of persons who participate in this initial effort. We will, therefore, postpone the Institute and will let you know the new date in due course.

In the meantime, in accordance with our plans, we will send out the materials which are being prepared. We must, I feel, be ready to move with courses early in the Fall, particularly for the new officers and grievancemen.

Rank-and-file ferment threatens steel peace

USW rebels charge President Abel devotes too much time to national causes. They would focus on membership complaints, authorize local strikes, reexamine AFL-CIO ties

I. W. Abel, who led a revolt at USW in 1965, faces one himself in 1969.

Since he ousted David J. McDonald as president of the United Steelworkers in a 1965 election, I. W. Abel has leaped into national prominence. He has reunited the leaders of USW's warring factions, negotiated two strike-free steel settlements, and assumed top AFL-CIO roles. Yet Abel faces a tough battle for reelection.

This time, unlike Abel's own revolt of "middle-management" union officers four years ago, the challenge is coming from the ranks—and it could be a potent one. Last week, Emil Narick, a lean, 52-year-old staff lawyer who heads a rank-and-file group, declared that he had won more than enough local union nominations to run against Abel in USW's Feb. 11 union-wide referendum.

Although Narick is definitely an underdog, his impressive nomination support in large basic-steel locals was a considerable blow to Abel's stature as the labor leader who "returned" his union to the rank-and-file. And it signaled to the troubled steel industry that along with import and profit problems it faces widespread unrest in the mills.

Bigger slate. The size and nature of the protest vote will be revealed next week in the official tally of nominations voted over the last month by 3,600 USW locals. Abel will win the nominations race—significant only as a barometer—by a very large margin. However, the count may put other candidates on the ballot for USW's three top offices.

A third presidential candidate, rank-and-filer William Litch, of Youngstown Local 1462, may make the ballot with a required 125 nominations. His fellow Rank-and-File Team (RAFT) candidate, Morros (Mo) Brummitt, of Aliquippa, Pa., could qualify to run against Secretary-Treasurer Walter J. Burke. But RAFT's vice-presidential candidate, Frank Felix, of Gary, Ind., has only a remote chance of opposing incumbent Joseph P. Molony on Feb. 11.

The prospect of an election fight can only be depressing for Abel, a white-haired, one-time foundryman whose belief in "fundamental trade unionism" and unostentatious team play has helped him become one of labor's ablest diplomats. At 60, he is often rumored as successor to AFL-CIO's president, George Meany.

Omens. Last week, as Narick continued to win large basic steel nominations in the Pittsburgh area by lopsided counts, Abel viewed his declining popularity "with real surprise, and a tinge of bitterness," says an associate. "He thinks he's worked pretty hard for the rank-and-file and doesn't deserve this slap in the face."

The mounting rebelliousness, in addition to dulling Abel's once bright image, also reflects a number of possible ill omens for the entire labor movement and steel industry:

- A growing rank-and-file isolationism; workers are demanding that their unions abandon labor's traditional liberal activism in national causes and attend to the rank-and-file's problems in the plants.
- An influx of young workers, reared on television and middleclass goals, many of them immune to old-timers' attempts to revive the union spirit of the 1930s.
- Long-smoldering discontent in basic steel over the effects of automation on jobs, earnings, and work practices, coupled with dissatisfaction with the 1968 steel contract.

As a result of these and other pressures, the Steelworkers now has been caught up in a furious political whirl. In addition to the top officers, at least 10 and possibly 14 of the union's 24 district directors will face election opposition. For a union that never had more than a few district races before 1964 this could presage future disruptive political jockeying.

"The days of Phil Murray and the empty ballot sheet are gone forever," says a USW staff man in California. "Abel's revolt in 1965 opened up the whole political process, and from here on in, all officers are going to have opposition."

Horse race. Narick, Litch, and other protest candidates are profiting from this heightened political climate, produced in part by USW's policy of electing all officers by referendum.

"With our referendum voting," says a former top McDonald aide, "any election opposition means a horse race. I seriously doubt whether Walter Reuther could have survived in this climate."

This is why Abel knows he will have to campaign hard to beat Narick. While Narick may only get a few hundred nominations (compared with Abel's count of 1,310 to 904 for McDonald in 1965), many of these are important ones.

Mill leverage. In the Pittsburgh area, where a dozen major steel mills dominate the river valleys, Narick made a clean sweep of the large locals. He was also nominated at large mills in Warren and Lorain, Ohio, Baltimore, Wheeling, W. Va., Alabama, and California.

However, Narick will be weak in Canada, which provided Abel's 10,142-vote margin of victory over McDonald in 1965. He apparently lacks strength also in the Midwest, and particularly in the Chicago-Gary district, whose director, Joseph Germano, is a co-chairman of the Abel-Burke-Molony campaign. Narick also is weak—and Abel strong—in USW's nonferrous division, particularly among former Mine, Mill & Smelter Worker locals now in USW.

Then, too, nominating votes have only limited significance. Usually, fewer than 5% of a local membership turns out for the voting, and these are generally the local's activists. At the 9,000-member Homestead, Pa., local, for example, only 368 voted—but 354 picked Narick.

"Abel is in real trouble in the mills," says a field staff representative in the Pittsburgh area. "These people are angry and upset over the last steel contract."

Vacation demand. Workers in basic steel mills comprise 40% of USW's 1.2-million members. Steel rank-and-filers scoff at Abel's claim that the 1968 settlement was "the best ever negotiated in this or any other industry." They condemn him for not winning reinstatement of a cost-of-living escalator clause, for deferring all benefit and pay gains—except an immediate 20¢ pay hike—until the second and third years, and for extending the vacation scheduling period from a May to November basis to year-round.

"Our people are now being scheduled for vacations in January and February, and they're grumbling," says a rank-and-filer at U. S. Steel Local 1408 in McKeesport, Pa. "A guy will have to have 30 years' service before he'll qualify to take a summer vacation with his kids."

For workers who are increasingly demanding the prerogatives of middle-class life, restrictions on summer vacations symbolize one of the strongest sources of discontent in the mills. Most of steel's current work force, hired since World War II, are better educated and more demanding than their fathers from the old country. They complain that USW leaders neglect their in-plant problems.

Look inward. Abel campaigned against McDonald in 1965 on this very issue, claiming that McDonald's fondness for a free-swinging social life and hobnobbing with business executives made him an "absentee president." Now Abel is getting the same treatment.

A harder worker than McDonald, Abel follows a rigorous schedule. But as a profound believer in the old CIO tradition that a labor leader must immerse himself in political and civic affairs, Abel has spent much time away from his desk on AFL-CIO business, political campaigns, and as a member of public bodies such as the Civil Disorders Commission.

USW rebel Emil Narick (center) stressed local problems in campaigning.

For this he is roundly attacked by Narick. A USW president should have virtually no public life and should confine his outside activities to lobbying for labor legislation, says Narick. He proposes to "reexamine" USW's affiliation with AFL-CIO and "to consider other alignments" possibly beneficial to USW members.

RAFT's William Litch takes an even more isolationist position. "The international officers," he says, "should spend all their time solving rank-and-file problems. They should not serve on local, state, or national outside committees. The AFL-CIO is a waste of time and money."

Automation impact. Litch, 46, a former disciple of Donald Rarick, the rank-and-file leader who almost deposed McDonald in a 1957 contest, inherited his mantle when Rarick died in September. A millwright with 28 years at Youngstown Sheet & Tube, he was demoted to oiler in a force cutback last August at a cost of 88¢ an hour in his paycheck. It is this kind of problem, he says, that Abel and his colleagues should solve.

His problem is an example of one of the most volatile issues in the mills. All steelmakers are installing new automated and computer-controlled equipment, and jobs are dwindling at a rapid rate. The new processes, ironically, often pay less money than the old. Moreover, automation increases the chaos already spawned by hundreds of non-uniform incentive pay plans. USW and the industry are now working to soften the impact of these problems in joint study committees, but rank-and-filers view such studies with a jaundiced eye.

As militants on local plant problems, both Narick and Litch would reintroduce local strikes in the steel industry—a move that Abel has carefully avoided. They would also let rank-and-filers ratify or reject contract settlements, a more "democratic" procedure, they contend, than the current vote by industry conferences of local presidents.

Enigmatic. Although Narick has campaigned tirelessly over the past month, chatting with rank-and-filers for hours on end, occasionally downing a shot and a beer in a workers' bar, he remains something of an enigma to most steelworkers. He is obviously not completely at ease as a politician, and he admits having been a "political neutral" during his 10 years with the Steelworkers. He did not support either Abel or McDonald in 1965.

He admits also that he has never been involved in high union policy-making or big industry bargaining. Says a puzzled staff man in USW's Pittsburgh headquarters: "Emil has always been a competent lawyer, but no one ever thought of inviting him to any sort of conferences where ideas were discussed."

There is some vagueness, too, as to what made him decide to run against Abel. Narick says his decision came because he believes that Abel is "wedded to a philosophy of the past." However, there are indications that some field staff representatives encouraged him to run, at least partly because his opposition would give them a bargaining point in pay talks with the Abel administration. They recently won a salary increase. End

Narick's Unofficial Total Put at 41% in Challenge To Head Steelworkers

Wall St. Journal

USW Lawyer's Bid to Beat Abel For Union's Presidency Drew Unexpectedly Strong Showing

2/17/69

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

PITTSBURGH—Emil E. Narick, the relatively unknown United Steelworkers staff lawyer who challenged I. W. Abel for the presidency of the giant union, appears to have polled an unexpectedly strong 41% of the vote in last week's election.

A Wall Street Journal survey of unofficial returns from 20 of the union's 24 geographical districts in the U.S. and Canada shows Mr. Abel with 195,668 votes to Mr. Narick's 138,194, with returns practically complete at most of the reporting districts.

Official results aren't likely to be known for several weeks, until the union's international tellers meet to certify results from each of the 1,250,000-member union's approximately 3,600 locals. The tellers will begin their count Friday. They also must rule on challenges likely to be filed at several locals.

Neither Mr. Abel nor Mr. Narick have commented publicly on the vote in the election Tuesday. Mr. Abel is in Bal Harbour, Fla., for an AFL-CIO meeting; Mr. Narick, at his home in Pittsburgh, says only that his supporters are making their own count of the vote. Abel aides stopped reporting their own unofficial tallies on Wednesday, when Mr. Abel had a two-to-one lead.

Setback for Abel Seen

The election has been interpreted as a setback for Mr. Abel, who had hoped to hold Mr. Narick's showing to 15% of the vote. But in addition to the challenger's strong showing, voters apparently rejected several of the union's powerful district directors, whom Mr. Abel had supported and who had supported him.

Mr. Narick showed his greatest strength in the Pittsburgh area, where he is best known. In District 15, which includes most of the Monongahela Valley, the center of Pittsburgh steelmaking operations, Mr. Narick pulled 20,500 votes to Mr. Abel's 8,500. In District 20, also in the Pittsburgh area, Mr. Narick drew 24,538 votes to Mr. Abel's 13,655. The challenger also appears to have won in large basic-steelmaking districts such as Cleveland and Youngstown, Ohio.

Mr. Narick ran on the platform that Mr. Abel didn't do enough for his members in last year's basic steel contract negotiations. Though Mr. Abel won a 6% wage and fringe benefit increase in the three-year pact, members claimed it wasn't enough. Many objected to the lack of a cost-of-living escalator in the contract, and others felt it slighted their needs on specific issues such as incentive pay, the contracting out of maintenance work and layoff and retirement provisions.

Trend at Some Locals

In fact, some observers saw a trend to Mr. Narick in basic steel locals, as opposed to locals at fabricating plants or those in nonferrous industries such as aluminum and mining. Said one staff representative in a district where Narick drew a substantial margin, rous industries such as aluminum and mining. Said one staff representative in a district where Narick drew a substantial margin, "When our fabricating locals came in, we had Abel running two-to-one ahead. It wasn't until the large basic steel vote came in that we found a change in the trend."

Among district directors who apparently lost their bids for reelection is James P. Griffin, director of District 26 in Youngstown since 1947 and cochairman of Mr. Abel's campaign. Mr. Griffin said at a press conference Saturday that he trails Frank Leseganich, president of Local 1462 in Youngstown, by about 1,000 votes. Mr. Griffin said, however, that he wouldn't concede until official tallies are made.

Other apparent losers are Paul E. Schremp, director of District 28 in Cleveland, who reportedly trails challenger Joseph Kender, president of Local 2265 in Cleveland, and Lester Thornton, District 38 director in Los Angeles, who unofficially was reported to have 17,606 votes to subdirector Joseph Angelo's 20,460.

Negro Candidate Trails

Anthony F. Barbieri, an Abel-backed candidate for director of District 4 in Buffalo. N.Y., is reported to have lost, as is Leander Simms, the first Negro to run for a district director post in the union; he sought to head District 8 in Baltimore. Mr. Abel had supported Mr. Simms and had appeared in Baltimore recently to recommend Mr. Simms' election. The apparent defeat of Mr. Simms by Edward Plato means that the union's 33-man executive board will remain all white, something Mr. Abel had hoped to change.

Mr. Plato was reported to have 7,609 votes to Mr. Simms' 5,650. Albert Atallah, the incumbent director, didn't run for reelection.

Paul M. Hilbert, incumbent director of District 15, McKeesport, Pa., said he trailed challenger Joseph Odorcich, a staff representative, by 400 votes. The outcome of this election will have to await settlement of a dispute over charges of ballot switching at Local 1397 in Homestead. Pa. Union sources have charged that about 1,000 uncounted ballots were stolen from the union hall during counting. The Department of Labor, at the request of Local 1397 president John McManigal, is investigating the charges.

CIVIL LIBERTIES

American Civil Liberties Union Of Georgia 52 Fairlie Street, N. W., Atlanta, Georgia 30303

File — ACLU

April 20, 1967

REPORT OF THE ANNUAL MEETING, MAY 27th

The membership meeting at the Atlanta Press Club was successful and productive. Over a hundred members attended to take part in the workshops, meet the new officers, hear of the Georgia ACLU's activities and, sadly, bid farewell to Florence Robin, retiring Executive Director.

Mrs. Robin gave a run down on the progress our chapter has made in the past two years. She contrasted the hopes and expectations she held when she assumed the directorship, and the realities of where we now are. She noted that Capital Punishment still exists, the loyalty oath has been diluted but still remains, prayers are still held in many public schools, a teacher tenure law is still nonexistant and that there is a Public Defender now in Fulton County but in the rest of the state, very little progress has been made in providing counsel for the indegent.

She reported that membership when she was first employed was one hundred eighty two in Georgia and we now have over eight hundred members and we have two new chapters -- Macon and Athens.

She mentioned that the "unplanned" cases, the Julian Bond case, the Georgia Elections case, the Alcoholics, the Prostitutes and the Homosexuals cases, because of the publicity they received, had a tremendous effect, educating the public and informing them of the real nature of civil liberties.

She felt the ACLU of Georgia could take particular pride in the "Know Your Rights" pamphlet. Its impact was not only in the "undereducated" but also in the Police Departments which have used it. (We are still supplying other ACLU chapters, college sociology classes and similar groups with copies.)

President Al Kehrer covered future goals for the organization; starting and helping new chapters in the state; continued membership growth and particularly, the need to involve individual members in our programs. To this end, we are enclosing two forms. One that will give us a profile, that will tell us your areas of interest, your talents, your thinking, opinions and suggestions. The second form is for a listing of your friends or of anyone that you feel might be good prospects for ACLU membership. The envelope enclosed is for the return of this information.

REPORT FROM THE WORKSHOPS

The members present divided into workshops covering the following: Death Penalty, Civil Liberties Education, Children Behind Bars and Rights of Welfare Recipients. Recommendations were made for ACLU action and two of the workshops formed the initial committees to that end. Again, on your profile form, your comments on these subjects will be appreciated.

DEATH PENALTY: 1) The ACLU of Georgia should oppose capital punishment and should work actively for its abolition.

2) A referendum, as proposed by the Governor, should be supported.

3) The ACLU should work actively with other groups in the state who are concerned with abolition; we should NOT take the public lead in supporting abolition because of the detrimental effect which ACLU involvement might have in various parts of the state.

4) Help should be solicited from the clergy of the state.

5) ACLU members should watch "Letters to the Editor", and answer letters which favor the retention of capital punishment.

6) A leaflet on capital punishment in other states should be considered.

7) The ACLU Newsletter should give members facts and history of capital punishment and its abolition in other states.

8) Petitions should be ruled out as being effective.

9) The ACLU should take any capital punishment cases which come to its attention, and a special fund should be established to pay the cost of such cases.

10) "Georgians for the Abolition of Capital Punishment" should be reactivated.

11) An Ad Hoc Committee on the Death Penalty, comprised of members of the workshops, was formed, with Mike Mahoney as Chairman.

CIVIL LIBERTIES EDUCATION: 1) A Speakers Bureau should be formed to be available to speak to interested groups. ACLU members should be used in this way.

2) Attempts to get a civil liberties education program into the school should be made. Social studies teachers should be contacted.

3) A booth might be operated at state conventions of various civic groups.

4) "Educational material" should be incorporated in news releases about cases in which the ACLU is involved.

5) More use should be made of filmstrips which are available from National ACLU.

6) T.V. and Radio should be utilized to put on educational programs.

7) Thought should be given of how to overcome the "red" image which the ACLU had in many quarters; approaches to the "conservative" community should be attempted.

CHILDREN BEHIND BARS: 1) A questionnaire should be sent to statewide members of the ACLU to gain information on the practices of juvenile courts and the handling of juvenile cases throughout the state.

2) An attempt should be made to learn how far Georgia is from meeting the standards of the Gault decision.

3) A pamphlet should be produced containing the results of this survey.

4) An Ad Hoc Committee, comprising members of the workshop, was formed. Mr. N. B. Versluys is the Chairman.

DUE PROCESS: 1) A survey of police procedures in the 5 county metropolitan area should be made.

2) Information on vagrancy arrests and bonding procedures should be accumulated.

3) Thought should be given to regarding homosexuality as a disease, just as alcoholism is now coming to be viewed.

4) A statewide public defender system should be established.

RIGHTS OF WELFARE RECIPIENTS: 1) A pamphlet for welfare recipients, advising them of their rights, (similar to "Know Your Rights") should be produced, to educate not only the recipient, but also the social worker and administrators.

2) A study should be made to determine whether Georgia laws and administrative procedures are consistent with the requirements of federal laws and procedures.

3) The scope of such a study should be limited to those areas which are covered in the National ACLU handbook.

4) It was recommended that a committee be formed, with Mike DeVito as Chairman.

A WARNING FROM NATIONAL ACLU: The Right and Importance of Dissent

The American Civil Liberties Union warns that freedom of expression is in danger because of the rising tension over the Vietnam War, declaring that "unless the right and importance of dissent are reaffirmed and defended, the nation could slip back into a new era of McCarthyism with its dangers to a free society -- fear, conformity and sterility."

The Union's appraisal was prompted by recent statements of public officials and prominent citizens seeking to curb or silence dissidence from government policy in Vietnam, and by a random survey of 43 ACLU affiliates across the nation revealing local pressures on dissenters.

While noting that dissent has not been smothered, " the time to worry, and to act, is not after dissent has been choked off, but when the evidence of repression come on the horizon. As the war escalates and citizens continue to demand more bombing -- or the end of bombing, or negotation or outright withdrawal of American troops -- clear and discernible pressures are rising for restraints and punishment of those who oppose the war."

The ACLU emphasized that its concern dealt exclusively with the right of dissent, taking "no organizational position on the war itself".

THE ALCOHOLICS CASE -- DRUNK OR SICK

The case now goes before the Fulton Superior Court and should come up sometime midsummer. Municipal court Judge R.E. Jones found the plaintiff guilty of public drunkeness and loafing but suspended punishment in both convictions and granted certiorari for an appeal. The ACLU was pleased that the way had been paved for the higher court to settle the issue: can a chronic alcoholic, a sick man according to a section in the Georgia Code, be legally arrested and sentenced on a drunk charge.

A FAIR PICTURE OF UNIONS IN OUR SCHOOLS?

High schools are one of the most important institutions in our society because they mold the opinions of all the young people in our communities. What ideas about unions do our schools transmit to the students? That is a question which concerns all our local lodges.

WHAT IS OUR RELATIONSHIP TO THE SCHOOLS?

From time to time, in communities where unions are strong, high school principals may ask our lodges to provide speakers on labor subjects, or to present their labor viewpoint in a social studies class or history class -- in other words, to act as a resource for the students. This, however, is the exception rather than the rule. We cannot expect it to happen automatically.

As representatives of the labor movement we have a responsibility to the community, and to all the young people who are being educated. It is up to us to lay the groundwork for establishing relations with all the secondary schools in our areas. Many schools have not yet accepted the fact that unions form an integral part of the community. How do we get them to do so? Before we consider ways in which this might be done, let's get to the heart of the matter --

HOW IS UNIONISM TAUGHT IN THE HIGH SCHOOLS?

Our own children learn about unions from their parents. When we sign a new contract, they hear at the dinner table about gains in wages, pensions, or insurance. When we have to go on strike, they learn why this drastic step is necessary and why the strike is a vital weapon as well as a democratic right. Our children may even tell us about a teacher who gave a biased presentation of unions in his class, or they may show us a misrepresentation which they have come across in one of their text books. The printed page does not always jibe with what they have heard at home.

But how about the large majority of school children whose parents do not belong to unions, or may be prejudiced against unions? What impression of the trade union movement do these students get in their classes? How is the history of the trade union movement and its current affairs treated in most of our schools?

According to Lee Scoggins in his recent book "Labor and Learning", based upon a study of 70 text books used in the 11th and 12th grades in Los Angeles, "by and large students receive an inadequate, often distorted and sometimes biased picture of the role of labor unions". If this happens in Los Angeles, it is likely to occur in most areas of the country.

As union members concerned with education, is it our responsibility to look into the teaching of labor history and unionism in our own schools? If we run across instances of bias or misrepresentation of facts, is there anything we might do to encourage a more objective presentation?

Let's consider the most effective way of handling this question of presenting unionism in our schools. To launch a formal inquiry might antagonize the school principal and the teachers and would defeat our purpose. What other approaches can we make?

HOW CAN WE BEST ACQUAINT TEACHERS AND STUDENTS WITH THE FACTS ABOUT UNIONS?

Here are some steps which your Local Lodge Education Committee might take:

1. First, establish good relationships with all the public and private schools in your community. We suggest that you make appointments with the principals of these schools. Send no more than two (2) committee members. Offer the services of your lodge as a source of information about organized labor and labor history. Here are some proposals you might make:

   - Tell the principal that should a speaker be desired to present the labor point of view on a panel or in American history or social studies classes, you are at his service.

   - Through the principal, invite both teachers and students to visit your Local Lodge office or District headquarters. Arrange it so that your president or business representative will be on hand to explain and answer questions.

   - The chances are that very few students have any idea of what goes into the making of many articles in their every day life which are produced by members of the IAM, such as airplanes, printing machines, musical instruments, computers, motion picture machines and refrigerators.

   - Suggest to the principal that your union would be glad to explain to the students what is required of machinists, tool and die makers, millwrights and other skills. If your Lodge can make the necessary arrangements, offer to take a group of students through one of our IAM plants to look at the various operations.

     The most important thing would be to let the students meet the shop steward in the plant and talk to him for a few minutes. This will give them a picture of an IAM shop that will make a far more lasting impression than any talk in class or at a school assembly.

2. When your committee members visit the principal, be sure that they leave with him a couple of pamphlets about the IAM and its programs. (A list of pamphlets and books is included in this bulletin.) Offer to put the school library on the mailing list for THE MACHINIST newspaper.

3. Offer to bring a film such as "The Inheritance" or "This Union Cause" to show to the students in assembly. They will learn more from the impact of a film than from simply being "told". Be sure to hold a question-and-answer period afterward.

4. For one of your education programs at a lodge meeting, invite an American history teacher or a social studies teacher to talk on how the subject of labor relations is presented in his class. Remember that he has in his class employers' and business executives' children, and professional and white collar children, as well as working class children who do not necessarily come from union families.

   - If there is a local union of the American Federation of Teachers in your community, its officers may be able to suggest the names of teachers to invite. During the question period, the matter of how labor history and unionism are handled in class can be discussed.

   - If the teachers are not members of the American Federation of Teachers, or perhaps are even anti-labor, it would be a good idea to warn the lodge members ahead of time not to shoot a fusilade of questions at the speakers. It is more important to encourage an impartial point of view, particularly if the teachers are not sympathetic to labor, than to put them on the spot. To antagonize them would turn them against unions instead of laying a foundation for understanding.

5. The members of the Education Committee may want to study labor history and current affairs to acquaint themselves with the subject in case they are called upon to speak.

   - If it seems advisable, you might ask the teachers to lend you some of the textbooks they use in class.

     Should the study group find any inaccuracies in the high school textbooks, the Education Committee might then discuss the most effective way of appealing to their sense of fairness and making the facts available to the teachers who use the textbooks.

6. Most of us who have children in school belong to the PTA. This is an opportunity to meet other parents as well as teachers.

   - Education Committee members should make a point of attending PTA meetings, especially at the beginning of the school year where the organization sets up its agenda for the year. The role of unions in fighting for a public school system might be suggested as a topic.

   - Swing or night shift workers might get their wives to pinch-hit for them. If the wives work too, recruit PTA members at the Lodge meeting.

In short:

1. Visit the principals of all the secondary schools in your community.

2. Offer -- union resource persons for classes,
   -- visits to Local or District headquarters,
   -- THE MACHINIST for the school libraries,
   -- a tour of an IAM plant if feasible.

3. Arrange to show a labor film at the schools.

4. Invite teachers of social studies or American history to talk to your members at a special education program. Ask the assistance of the American Federation of Teachers in your locality.

5. Set up a group to study labor history and union affairs. This, or another group, may want to examine school textbooks for misrepresentation of the role of unions.

6. Work within the PTA to educate parents and teachers about unions.

UNION REPRESENTATION ON THE BOARD OF EDUCATION

Unions are practically the only organized group that stand for the broad interests of the community. For this reason it is of the utmost importance therefore to elect members to the Board of Education who have a fair viewpoint on all social questions including labor, and who believe in obtaining good, well-rounded teachers.

Members of the Board of Education, if they are fair, should be willing to draw up an adequate budget to allow the highest possible salaries for teachers, and to stand ready to defend their budget convincingly before the city or county fathers.

Your Local Lodge Education Committee should work with the Lodge Legislative and MNPL Committees and cooperate with the local AFL-CIO or provincial central body, to elect responsible, broadminded members to the Board of Education.

- Of course, this is a long-term project. It should be started long before the election to permit time for interviewing, screening and bringing candidates before the lodge or central body to express their views.

- If organized labor in your community should decide to support a candidate for the Board of Education, it would be essential to coordinate plans for the political campaign with the unions involved, and also to rally additional support from other interested sectors of the community.

- To help secure the necessary votes to elect your candidate to the Board of Education, your committee should conduct a well-planned educational canvass of every member of the Lodge. Person to person discussion of the issues involved, including the teaching of unionism in our high schools, would be more effective than just a handbill distribution.

BUT USE YOUR STEWARDS FIRST. LET THEM SPREAD THE WORD.

IAM EDUCATION DEPARTMENT ACTIVITIES

During the summer of 1967 the Education Department has conducted eighteen Machinists' Leadership Schools in the United States and Canada. This was a record number of schools. There was also a record attendance of over 800 officers, stewards, committeemen and members of our IAM Lodges. We thank the Lodges and Districts for sending students to the schools, and the students for devoting a concentrated week to learning and discussion.

Twelve of the 5-day programs were basic schools, six were advanced schools. One of the basic schools was planned for the sole benefit of French-speaking Canadians and conducted entirely in French. The program at the basic schools was much the same as in previous years. The advanced schools dealt with collective bargaining, communication, leadership, current union problems and politics.

The IAM Education staff was the same as last year. In addition to the Territorial Representatives assigned to education, several Grand Lodge Representatives who had never before done so participated as instructors. Three additional universities sponsored our IAM program for the first time.

As the fall and winter seasons approach, the Education Department stands ready to assist Lodge Education Committees in planning their programs. We will be glad to suggest written materials for these programs, and to help in every way possible.

Tough new team gets on the road

Alliance for Labor Action finally starts rolling as Teamsters and UAW join forces to push social and organizing goals

Like a couple of blue-collar workers having a brew in the toughest bar in town, the United Auto Workers and the International Brotherhood of Teamsters looked each other over this week, decided to trust each other, and declared themselves ready to take on any outside challengers. But, they said they were not spoiling for a fight.

The mood of togetherness was created in a two-day meeting in Washington in which the two giant unions formally founded their long-planned Alliance for Labor Action.

As partners, the 2-million-member Teamsters and the 1.4-million-member Auto Workers seem an improbable match, and some officials who were meeting each other for the first time were wary. But the meeting wound up with leaders on both sides convinced they had forged a new union team that would "revitalize the labor movement."

Synergy. The benefits of togetherness were immediately apparent. For the UAW, which clearly will provide the main thrust, the alliance gives UAW President Walter Reuther a powerful base from which to push the causes he espoused within the AFL-CIO, programs he claims were ignored by the federation. For the Teamsters, who have been outcasts in the labor movement since their expulsion from the AFL-CIO in 1956, the ALA offers new opportunities to belong. Teamsters President Frank Fitzsimmons will have an equal voice with UAW President Reuther in the alliance, and Teamster members will help provide the organizing muscle to back Reuther's ideological thrust.

Traditionally, the Teamsters and UAW have been as far apart philosophically as their leaders are in personality. But when the quiet, businesslike Fitzsimmons and the aggressive, evangelistic Reuther heralded the opening of their new alliance, they sounded like long-time fellow unionists whose coming together was a natural outgrowth of their mutual labor struggles.

Indeed, after a rather awkward opening—Teamster officials arrived 45 minutes late—the conference resembled an old-time labor federation convention as the 489 delegates (242 Teamsters, 247 Auto Workers) passed a series of resolutions running the gamut of labor and social programs—and clear through domestic and international issues. In a carefully planned program, Fitzsimmons, Reuther, and other IBT and UAW leaders alternated at the microphone, urging support for the resolutions.

Togetherness is keynote as UAW's evangelistic Walter Reuther sets fighting aims for ALA. Frank Fitzsimmons (seated) has pledged full support of his Teamsters.

Plans and punch. To support their goals to organize "millions of unorganized workers," "revitalize collective bargaining," build "community unions," promote urban redevelopment, and accomplish a host of other ends, the two unions pledged a joint treasury of some $4.2-million annually, financed from 10¢-per-month-per-member payments.

But even as Fitzsimmons and Reuther emphasized that the alliance resulted from the labor movement's failure to tackle domestic and social issues, both insisted it was not intended to be a rival of the AFL-CIO. "The ALA," said Fitzsimmons, "is not a competitive labor federation. Indeed, it is the competition between labor organizations which we seek to place at rest."

Said Reuther: "We shall extend the hand of cooperation and support to any organization that is prepared to cooperate in the task of organizing the millions of unorganized, whether they be industrial workers or white-collar workers, whether they be workers in the South or migratory workers, or the working poor."

Challenge. But he added that "we do not accept the proposition that any organization has a divine right to sit upon its paper jurisdiction claims and block the organization of a million unorganized workers in America."

The ALA leaders made clear they are likely to differ with the AFL-CIO on a number of issues. Officials of both unions, for example, sharply denounced the Administration's plan to go ahead with even limited deployment of antiballistic missiles. Recently, the AFL-CIO executive council pledged support of whatever decision President Nixon made on the ABM.

If the combined thrust of heavy financial support and a weighty agenda is sufficient, the ALA is a going concern. It has rented office space in Washington, and the two unions have agreed to name co-chairmen and four special representatives each to an executive council. After a year of planning, the alliance appears ready to open its doors.

However, an intensive search has so far failed to produce a candidate for the post of ALA director. Nor has the alliance taken in any new members, though the welcome mat has been out some time.

Prospects? Significantly, officials of several AFL-CIO unions appeared at the meeting as "special guests," sitting in a roped-off section at the rear of the convention hall. These union observers included a team from the International Chemical Workers Union, headed by President Thomas E. Boyle, and a trio from the United Glass & Ceramic Workers, with President Ralph Reiser. None of these officials indicated they were prepared to join ALA immediately, though the ICWU had voted at its last convention to align itself with the alliance.

Said one ICWU official: "There's absolutely no pressure on us here. We want to see what's happening." One obvious concern: AFL-CIO President George Meany's call for expulsion of any federation affiliate that joins the ALA.

Despite Meany's castigation of ALA as a "rival federation," the alliance showed drawing power in official circles. Labor Secretary George P. Shultz and Federal Mediation Director J. Curtis Counts were featured speakers. Counts, explaining his presence, said: "It may surprise you to know that one-fifth of all cases handled by our federal mediators involve the Teamsters and the United Auto Workers."

Action. But the meeting's principal business was its "statement of purposes and objectives and constitution." And the delegates approved the establishment of "a voluntary emergency defense fund with sufficient resources to provide meaningful assistance to workers under circumstances where management refuses to bargain in good faith in a deliberate effort to weaken, undermine, and destroy the union involved as an appropriate and effective bargaining agent."

The size of the defense fund was not decided, but the ALA delegates made their first contribution: $25,000 to the striking hospital workers in Charleston, S. C.

In dividing ALA responsibilities, Fitzsimmons takes on the organizing programs, Reuther the social action campaigns. Each official is to be aided by two representatives from the other union. UAW Vice-President Pat Greathouse, pointing to ALA organizing targets, cited such likely areas as chemicals, textiles, furniture, transportation, and chain stores.

At home. Despite the tardy opening and the initial wariness, particularly on the part of the Teamsters, the founding conference went off on schedule without incident. One Teamster leader noted privately: "Our fellows seem to be coming around."

And IBT Vice-President Murry W. (Dusty) Miller noted from the platform: "This is the first time the Teamsters have been asked to join hands with another labor union [pause] that had any money."

Internal strains may develop, however, when the ALA seeks to implement at least one of its announced goals: support of mass-produced factory housing "to meet America's housing crisis." The UAW already has a sizable investment in this field in its collective bargaining contracts with prefabricated housing factories in Detroit. The powerful AFL-CIO building trades unions oppose factory-built housing—and the Teamsters have close ties with these unions in many parts of the country.

AFL-CIO weathers the loss

Withdrawal of Auto Workers hasn't hurt federation as much as expected, but it has left some weaknesses

One year has passed since the AFL-CIO's biggest union and goad—the United Auto Workers—left the fold. Today, the federation is "feeling no pains and the irritation's gone," says an AFL-CIO spokesman.

Less clinically, the federation does show some weaknesses. The loss of membership and income has forced some cuts. Significantly, organizing efforts have been hurt. And the expulsion of UAW officials from state and local central bodies has caused a leadership gap.

The pullout. Walter Reuther led the Auto Workers from the federation in May, 1968, after a long dispute with AFL-CIO President George Meany reached a point of no return. UAW said "the federation has become isolated from the mainstream and too often acts like a comfortable, complacent custodian of the status quo."

Recently, AFL-CIO's executive council issued a 40,000-word reply to "clear the record." But with the federation's biennial convention set for Atlantic City early in October, the Meany vs. Reuther, AFL-CIO vs. UAW debate is far from over.

A 10% loss . . . Withdrawal of UAW from the 130-union federation cut its total membership and income by roughly 10%; AFL-CIO dropped from 14.5-million members in affiliated unions to 13.1-million without UAW. It lost about $100,000 a month in per capita income. Indirectly, it lost more: UAW cut off funds to the Industrial Union Dept., once a dynamic force for organizing and other action, now only a low-power, small-budget agency.

The loss of money hurt. But Secretary-Treasurer William Schnitzler, who retires June 30, insists that it has hurt less than many had expected.

Some programs have been curtailed, but part of these—such as AFL-CIO's $350,000 a year for the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions—probably would have been curtailed anyway. Staff has been pared down, but in a number of instances this was done by not replacing UAW technicians who quit. A spokesman commented, "Nothing that's needed to be done has been canceled."

. . . but still hearty. A few days ago, Lane Kirkland, executive assistant to Meany and recently designated successor to Schnitzler, said that AFL-CIO is "very healthy" today. Without Reuther, he suggested, it's united to an extent that it wasn't a year ago. It has gained back some of the membership ground lost, mostly in the public employment and services fields: Its unions now claim 13.5-million members. And, according to Kirkland, the federation is "pushing ahead smoothly."

Weaknesses. But the withdrawal of UAW has left areas of weakness.

It isn't doing as much as it would like to supplant IUD activities in organizing aid. While autonomous unions are on their own in organizing, bargaining, and other activities, the federation does have a small staff of organizers who can be assigned to pep up lagging campaigns here and there.

Lack of funds and staff are only a part of the reason, however. Federation leaders say that a more important factor is the lack of organizing cooperation by individual unions, largely the result of jurisdictional and other rivalries. AFL-CIO says that more mergers would help.

Another and bigger weakness today is in the ranks of AFL-CIO subordinate state and local central bodies. For years, many of these drew on UAW locals for leadership and financial support. In many of these lower federations, UAW unionists were kept in office for months, by common consent. Most have now been forced out by orders from Meany's office in Washington. Leadership gaps have developed and activities have suffered in many places.

Political action may be hurt over the long run, but cooperation between AFL-CIO and UAW groups was almost completely unimpaired last November. Any weakening of the ties between AFL-CIO state and local central bodies and UAW could be reflected in elections and laws.

And AFL-CIO is about to be forced into what could be an unpopular increase in its per capita levy on unions. A dues increase will be proposed in October to finance the costs of year-round, every-year voter registration campaigns in all major states, and to pay for a "labor college" to be established by the federation in Washington next fall. While the dues raise will be pushed as necessary for the new programs, it probably wouldn't have been necessary if UAW was still paying per capita.

New faces. Two weeks ago, the federation took steps in one direction that Reuther had said it should go: An executive council subcommittee proposed that AFL-CIO increase its number of vice-presidents from 27 to 33 "to recognize new areas of real or potential growth . . . and to extend leadership opportunities to a wider segment of the labor movement."

No unions were suggested, but it's almost certain that public employee unions and those in technical and service areas will get most of the new seats: They have been growing the fastest and producing young and effective new leaders. End

Launch ALA to rejuvenate U. S. labor

America's largest unions join hands to organize the working poor, attack ABM, work for tax reform, build new programs to free the oppressed

Teamster General Vice President Fitzsimmons and UAW President Reuther join hands as ALA gets underway.

America's two biggest unions—embracing nearly 4 million workers—put together an alliance last week with a special accent.

The Alliance for Labor Action (ALA) combines the Teamsters and Auto Workers in a giant undertaking to organize millions of non-union workers and to combat poverty where it occurs.

As a byproduct of the ALA's founding conference a new anti-war coalition of unionists has also been built.

"We find the youth of the nation up in arms over an unpopular war in Vietnam," Teamster Vice President Frank Fitzsimmons told the ALA conference in a keynote message, "up in arms over the billions of dollars this country spends annually to carry on this war in the Far East, when our own people are begging right here at home."

Fitzsimmons emphasized, and UAW President Reuther echoed the same note, that the ALA was not another labor federation. A new approach aimed at the solution of today's unique problems is the ALA's "thing." Programs will be financed by per capita payment of 10 cents a month per member by the two organizations.

National Security, ABM and Human Needs

"Throughout the last quarter of a century, the first twenty-five years of the nuclear age, nations of the world have persisted in the traditional search for national security through the accumulation of military power, as if the advent of nuclear weapons had not completely transformed the nature of warfare and the foundations of international diplomacy.

"Half the governments of the earth spend more on defense than on education. The average annual expenditure per soldier worldwide in 1966 was $7,800. Yet the average annual public expenditure for each of the estimated one billion school-age youth from age 5 to 19 was only about $100.

U.S. military budget can be cut from $5 billion to $20 billion without impairing U.S. security, says ALA.

"The world's public health budget—about $52 billion—was only one-third of the military budget. Economic assistance to poorer countries came to $8 billion, less than 0.5 percent of gross national product of the developed countries and equal to only 6 percent of their military spending.

"Most of the world's military spending is concentrated in the United States and the Soviet Union. With 13 percent of the world's population, they account for over two-thirds of the world's military budget.

"Now for the first time in almost a quarter of a century, this gross distortion of priorities is being critically examined and questioned in the United States, and in the Congress of the United States. An increasing number of the American people and their representatives are concerned not only by this distortion of priorities but by the dangers implicit in a further escalation of the arms race if an anti-ballistic missile system (ABM) is deployed as part of our nuclear arsenal.

"Call it Sentinel, call it Safeguard, call it a defensive weapon; move it from the suburbs of our large cities to our offensive missile sites. Changing its name and its location does not change the name of the game, which is military one-upmanship and the escalation of destructive power which is already overwhelming on both sides. By any other name, the balance of terror is still terror; and each time, as the balance of terror is upset, and as the arms race continues and escalates to a new plateau of destructiveness, and as preparation for war continues to take precedence over an organized search for peace, the odds creep up that the terrible weapons will one day go off, by accident, by irrational impulse, or by design. The only security in the game of nuclear chicken lies in a decision to end it by mutual agreement by the major powers to scale down their arsenals and to seek an accommodation of interests bringing a greater degree of stability into the world.

"We in the Alliance for Labor Action have no illusions about the evils of communism, either the Russian or the Chinest version. Neither, let it be stressed again, have we any illusions about what will happen to ourselves, our families, our unions and our country if we continue to tempt fate by continued escalation of the nuclear balance of terror.

"We call upon the President and the Congress to reexamine the projected Defense budget for fiscal 1970, in light of more realistic force requirements, in order to effect cuts now—variously estimated at from $5 billion to $20 billion—which can be made at once without impairing national security, in order that such savings can be used to meet critical home-front needs—in education, health care, housing, anti-pollution, traffic congestion, broad environmental problems and conservation of resources."

Hospital Workers' Strike, Charleston, South Carolina

"The ALA pledges its full support and solidarity behind the striking hospital workers in Charleston, South Carolina, in their struggle to win recognition and a living wage. As an expression of our support, the ALA Executive Committee has approved a contribution of $25,000 to be used directly to assist the workers in winning their strike and just demands.

HELP FOR STRIKERS is presented to Charleston, South Carolina, hospital strikers. ALA is designed to give practical help to oppressed workers unable to fight power and might of anti-union groups. A check for $25,000 to valiant union of working poor in Deep South is example of ALA's determination to move labor movement forward.

A FARFLUNG PROGRAM to make life better for all Americans is proclaimed by ALA banners shown here during two day proceedings.

Organizing the Unorganized and Collective Bargaining

". . . It is clearly the purpose of the ALA not to raid the membership of established unions; it is, rather, to bring to unorganized workers the benefits and advantages of unionism and collective bargaining in the spirit of solidarity which has distinguished the American labor movement in the most successful, the most heroic and the finest hours of its history.

". . . The urgency of this task necessitates that organizational activities be carried out based upon the sound policy that no union has exclusive jurisdictional claims that can veto the ability of a modern and responsible labor movement to extend the opportunities, the rights, benefits and protection of organization and collective bargaining.

". . . The most significant current developments affecting collective bargaining are the revolutionary pace with which technology alters the methods and means of production, transportation and distribution and the rapid growth in the number and size of multi-industry (conglomerate) corporations in the national economy.

"Industry's traditional lines of jurisdiction become increasingly blurred. A single conglomerate may be involved in diverse industrial and commercial endeavor ranging from packing meats to building locomotives; from preparing food to producing sporting goods; from manufacturing textile machinery to building spaceships; from producing paint to assembling complicated electronic gear for aerospace use; from airline operations to moving picture production. . . ."

Tax Reform

"The ALA will work for sweeping and drastic reform of federal, state and local tax systems to make them more equitable based upon the principle of ability to pay. The details of such reform cannot be spelled out in detail here. Studies already undertaken by tax experts have revealed that the following changes are essential as a beginning:

"1. An increase in personal exemptions to $1,800 for the taxpayer and $900 for each dependent up from the current exemption of $600.

"2. Future adjustment of exemption levels in accordance with changes in the cost of living.

"3. Liberalization of the standard deduction.

"4. Exemption from employee contributions to Social Security of amounts of earnings that are below the poverty level, contributions on these amounts to be made instead by the federal government out of its general revenues.

"5. Immediate plugging of all known tax loopholes, to insure that wealthy individuals and big corporations bear their fair share of the tax burden.

"6. Enactment of a minimum income tax provision, to assure that any income which did find its way through tax loopholes would nevertheless be subject to taxation.

"The ALA commits itself to join with others who are committed to basic tax reform in establishing a National Committee for Tax Justice and through such Committee help mobilize and direct the growing taxpayer revolt in America to the end that basic and long overdue tax reform is achieved on the basis of equity and the principle of ability to pay."

"I, for one, do not believe that the so-called generation gap is something which cannot be bridged. I believe that a constructive and meaningful dialogue can be established with the youngsters, if we only take the time to talk to them. Just standing back and shaking our heads when they storm a university or when they demonstrate is not enough.

"We, in the Teamsters, and in the UAW, I am certain, intend to establish communications with the youngsters, simply because they will be taking up positions of leadership in organized labor and in the country as some of the present leaders retire.

"We find the youth of the nation up in arms over an unpopular war in Vietnam, up in arms over the billions of dollars this country spends annually to carry on this war in the Far East, when our own people go begging right here at home.

"This war, the bane and the plague of both Democratic and Republican administrations, must be stopped, and must be stopped soon.

"If it is not, its consequences will tear the fabric of Americanism until there is serious doubt that the tear can be mended satisfactorily.

"We do not stand here today, like so many criticizing the administration for the war, but proposing no solutions. We don't have a solution, other than to urge the administration to make settlement of the war its number one priority. We take this position because until this war is stopped, all of our domestic problems and social ills will go unsolved.

"So, with all of these things in mind, over a year ago, many of us in the Teamsters began to ponder what could be done to give the labor movement new direction, and if new direction was found what could be done to put plans for correction into action.

"We found that there was similar thinking in the leadership of the United Auto Workers, and after many talks with the leaders of that great union, we decided to sit down and pool our concerns and our ideas."

FRANK FITZSIMMONS
—Teamster General Vice President

"In order to face these new problems, to face these new challenges, we need to recognize it will take new ideas and new concepts and new social inventions, and the ALA will be groping for those new ideas and those new concepts as we help America find answers to its problems."

tor Charles Percy, South Dakota U. S. Senator George McGovern, and Conciliation Service Director J. Curtis Counts. Resolutions were debated and adopted on 1) National Security, ABM, and Human Needs; 2) Tax Reform; 3) Organizing the Unorganized and Collective Bargaining; 4) Community Unions; 5) Health Care and National Health Insurance; 6) America's Housing Crisis; and 7) Charleston, South Carolina, Hospital Workers Strike.

Much of the first day's speechmaking and resolutions was centered on the foolishness of the ABM (anti-ballistic missile). Both Teamster and UAW speakers alike denounced this huge expenditure on an untried weapons system which will rob the American people of security and pressing needs at home. Sen. Percy, a leading Republican critic of military spending, charged that the ABM was "money down the drain."

"We are going to rebuild the cities or they are going to burn," said Auto Workers President Walter Reuther in urging the junking of old codes and the use of industrial mass production techniques to build 26 million new housing units.—from Associated Press account of ALA conference last week.

A new thrust at organizing the poor into community unions was another first day feature. Roughly 20 million American workers are organized into unions out of a total employment of 80 million; thus only one out of four workers are unionized in the United States today.

The chairman of the Teamsters big Southern Conference, Murray "Dusty" Miller, supported the ALA resolution on organizing by stating: "This is the first time I've been invited to join hands with a union that has any money . . . The UAW has $83 million in its treasury; we can spend about $80 million of that down South."

"You Are Standing on My Air Hose"

This morning, as we gather for the First Conference of the Alliance for Labor Action, I am reminded of a story:

There was a poor chap, lying flat on his back in an oxygen tent on a hospital bed. Into the hospital room walked a priest, who moved up to the bed and looked down upon the poor fellow. As the priest stood there, the man in the oxygen tent made great efforts to communicate with the Father, but was able only to move his lips. The priest realized the poor condition of the man, and thought it might be time to administer last rites.

As the priest pondered the situation, the patient made a motion as if writing a note on the palm of his hand with his finger. The priest sensed that the man wanted to write a note, so he slipped a pad and pen to the man under the oxygen tent. With great difficulty, the patient scribbled a note, lurched and died. The priest reached under the oxygen tent and retrieved the note which said:

"You are standing on my air hose."

Well, in a sense, The Alliance for Labor Action was formed because something or someone is standing on the air hose from which America receives its vitality.

—from Remarks by FRANK E. FITZSIMMONS, Teamster General Vice President

UAW Vice President Pat Greathouse noted the gaps in organizing workers in chemicals, textiles, chain stores, distribution, transportation, white collar, agriculture, furniture, government and general office occupations. The ALA presented its first check of $25,000 to a spokesman for the striking hospital workers in Charleston, South Carolina.

There were strong hints that major undertakings will be made to organize the working poor. Reuther said, in discussing the need for a dynamic push forward on organizing: "We do not accept the proposition that any organization has a divine right to sit upon its paper jurisdictional claims and block the organization of millions of unorganized workers in America."

America's Housing Crisis

"America's housing crisis is staggering and it continues to worsen, for the forces of decay and demolition continue to outrun our efforts to rebuild and rehabilitate.

"At a minimum, we must meet the objectives of the 1968 Federal Housing Act, which calls for a ten-year national goal of 26 million new housing units, including at least 6 million units for low income families. In recent years, we have produced only about 50,000 subsidized housing units a year, or only one-twelfth of the annual volume projected in the 1968 Housing Act. The National Commission on Urban Problems recently stated that there are 11 million substandard or overcrowded housing units in the United States—and it called this a very conservative estimate.

"The shame of the nation is the state of our cities. Our center cities continue to decay. These cities more and more consist of spreading ghettoes that are enclosures of poverty and racial discrimination. These ghettoes breed permanent despair, and rip the fabric of our society.

"We must face up to the problem of antiquated and restrictive building codes which fragment the housing market and pyramid the cost of housing. A national system of performance standards to insure the highest standard and quality and to meet the needs of geographical conditions should be developed to cover all federally financed housing construction in order to facilitate the assembly of a mass market so that the economies of scale can be achieved in the construction of housing."

"We must apply to the housing industry our most advanced technological capability and managerial and productive know-how, our most creative product design capability, and the use of new materials. Only in this way can we reduce the cost of construction and increase the volume needed to make high quality, attractive housing available at a price that millions of low and moderate income families who desperately need housing they can afford."

"I, as one American, believe that a nation that has the technical and managerial capability of putting a man on the moon has the technical and productive managerial capability of building decent houses at a price that millions of families in America can afford, for those who desperately need housing."

—WALTER P. REUTHER

Community Unions

"The constituent unions of the ALA have developed much skill and know-how over the years in the organization of workers, in negotiations, and in dealing with both private and public agencies. Out of our experience, we became expert in self-help activities at the local or neighborhood level.

"In these structures, we as unions, and our members as concerned citizens, must become participating partners with the poor.

"It has become apparent in recent years that the skills that have made our unions strong are the very skills that are critically needed in urban and rural areas where millions of the unemployed or working poor are obliged to cope with the neighborhood and community problems requiring organized action. . .

"The ALA, in recognition of the urgency of dealing with the pressing problems of the poor and the disadvantaged, the unemployed, the underemployed and the working poor, pledges resources and its organizational skills and know-how working directly with the poor in their communities, helping them to build self-help organizations and to achieve the influence and leverage needed to move their problems to solution."

"We shall extend the hand of cooperation and support to any organization that is prepared to cooperate in the task of organizing the millions of unorganized, whether they be workers in the South or migratory workers or the working poor."—WALTER P. REUTHER

LABOR SECRETARY SCHULTZ was at the ALA conference with a message of cooperation from the U.S. Department of Labor. He defended his stand on farm workers and Job Corps closings, and was given a respectful if unconvinced hearing by delegates from the two largest labor organizations in the nation.

SEN. GEORGE McGOVERN, leading Senate critic of the war and hunger, told the ALA it was on the right track in pressing for a new direction in U.S. priorities. He praised Fitzsimmons and Reuther for their statements on the war, racism, and their willingness to work for a decent life for all Americans.

Health Care and National Health Insurance

"The right to good health care is increasingly being recognized in America as a fundamental human right, yet millions of Americans—and not only the poor and dependent groups but large numbers of middle income self-supporting families—do not have equal access to the high quality health services which our modern medical sciences can provide.

"The United States is already spending more on health care, estimated at $58 billion in 1969, and a larger percentage of Gross National Product, estimated at 6.5%, than any other industrialized nation in the world.

"Tens of thousands of babies are dying needlessly in America. Between the years 1953 and 1966 the United States dropped from 8th to 13th place in infant mortality. Our rate of 23.4 per 1000 live births compares with an average of 19.9 for economically advanced nations of Western Europe;

"The health of American men and women is not as good as in many other countries despite the fact that we spend so much on health care. More American males are dying in their productive years of 40 to 50 than in fifteen other major countries of the world.

"Only about one-third of consumer health expenditures are covered by private insurance and some 30 million Americans have no coverage at all. The costs of health care in the last ten years have soared twice as rapidly as the increases in the cost of living.

"Our wasteful, disorganized, inefficient complex of public and private programs provides little incentive to organize our health care 'delivery' system to make the most appropriate and effective use of our medical resources and to remove the present financial, geographic and social barriers to comprehensive and reliable health care services.

"The United States is the last remaining industrialized country in the world which does not have a national health insurance plan which would assure all its people at least minimum guarantee to access to needed medical care."

"The ALA pledges its fullest support and cooperation to the work of the California Council for Health Plan Alternatives and to the Committee for National Health Insurance."

WEEKEND WRAPUP

The new labor alliance of Teamsters and UAW is off and running. It promises new hope to 7 million "working poor" Americans who work at pay scales below the poverty level. Now watch ALA's organizing fur fly. Senate anti-ABMers (which includes most of labor's legislative friends in Congress) were cheered to have the two largest unions in America join them in a rousing denunciation of excessive military spending. . . . Sen. Charles Percy of Illinois, in addressing the ALAers, was emphatic in stating the federal government should guarantee a job for every person willing to work and not able to get a job from private employers. Percy got a big hand when he praised Sen. Paul Douglas, whom he defeated in 1966. Douglas once commented that the quality of his opposition was improving with each election, and today Percy talks like a midwest Jake Javits, which must bother a lot of rockribbed conservatives in Chicage Tribune-land. . . . The tobacco lobby is taking its licks from a House congressional committee. A new warning on cigarettes will read, unless the lobby can overturn things, "Warning: The Surgeon General has determined that cigarette smoking is dangerous to your health and may cause lung cancer or other diseases." Brock Adams thinks the warning doesn't go far enough and he's promising a floor fight to strengthen the warning. . . . The tax reform bill is beginning to shape up in the House Ways and Means Committee. There are still some tough hurdles, but the committee has agreed to tighten the loopholes on foundations, hobby farms, unlimited charitable contributions and unrelated business income of churches and social organizations. Chairman Wilbur Mills is promising action before Congress adjourns for a recess in August. Some of the real tax toughies like the 7 percent investment credit, tax exempt bonds, the depletion allowance, and capital gains are yet to come up for committee action. . . . A war profits tax bill was introduced last week in the Senate by George McGovern. Sponsors say this bill would bring the U.S. Treasury some $10 billion a year. After-tax corporate profits have risen 33 percent since the Vietnam war was escalated in 1965. The last quarter of 1968 brought corporate profits, after taxes, to a high of $51 billion for the year, compared to $33.1 billion for 1963. Defense contractors have enjoyed unparalleled growth in profits since the war was escalated. General Dynamics showed a 22 percent increase, General Electric profits were up 21.7 percent, United Aircraft up 56 percent and Boeing up 65 percent. . . . Sen. William Proxmire, chairman of the Joint Economic Committee, has issued a scathing indictment of military waste called "The Economics of Military Procurement" which will become the bible for congressmen seeking to put the clamps on topheavy defense spending. Says the report: "Literally billions of dollars have been wasted on weapons systems that have had to be cancelled because they did not work. Other systems performed far below contract specification. For example, one study referred to in the hearings shows that of a sample of 13 major Air Force and Navy aircraft and missile programs initiated since 1955 at a total cost of $40 billion, less than 40 percent produced systems with an acceptable electronic performance. Two of the programs were cancelled after total program costs of $2 billion were paid. Two programs costing $10 billion were phased out after 3 years for low reliability."

Current ABM proposals have been estimated to cost anywhere from $6 billion to $400 billion when fully developed. $23 billion has already been spent on 41 missile systems never deployed or abandoned in formative stages, representing over 6% of the national debt.

New Labor Alliance To Make First Drive In the Atlanta Area

Joint Venture of Teamsters, UAW Eyes 50,000 Workers; Organizing Starts Next Week

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON—The Alliance for Labor Action is on the move.

The joint venture of the Teamsters Union and the United Auto Workers, formally launched in late May, announced that it will open its first organizing drive after Labor Day in the metropolitan Atlanta area. Acting Teamsters President Frank Fitzsimmons said the drive will focus on 50,000 nonunion workers employed in six industrial parks that ring Atlanta.

The announcement of the organizing drive came less than a week after the AFL-CIO International Chemical Workers Union joined the ALA; it was the first union to do so. The Chemical Workers would like to remain in the AFL-CIO, which views the alliance as a rival federation and last year threatened to suspend or expel any affiliate that joined.

Thus far, however, the federation has been silent on the Chemical Workers' move. There's been "no response of any kind" from the federation, a Chemical Workers union official said yesterday.

Still, it appears unlikely that the AFL-CIO will continue to ignore the matter. If it doesn't discipline the Chemical Workers, other affiliates might feel free to join the Teamsters-Auto Workers combine with little or no risk.

Labor sources said the 50,000-member Glass and Ceramic Workers Union is considering joining the alliance, though a final decision might be postponed until it's clearer what will happen to the Chemical Workers' membership in the AFL-CIO.

The alliance, which was formed to "revitalize" the labor movement, is apparently being a bit choosy as to whom it allows in. Earlier this month, the ALA rejected a request for affiliation from the 12,000-member Federation of Telephone Workers of Pennsylvania, an independent union.

I. C. Glendenning, president of the Telephone Workers group, said he was told the application was turned down because the alliance is "taking only international unions."

The Atlanta organizing campaign will draw staff people from Teamsters and UAW locals already in the area. The Teamsters have about 12,000 members there and the Auto Workers 20,000.

Atlanta was chosen as the initial target, ALA men said, because it is the "most industrialized" area in the South. The alliance has "no exact timetable" for launching other organizing drives, sources said. But one indicated the alliance would probably "want to see some action down there" before expanding its organizing efforts.

Alliance for Labor Action

Meany-Reuther showdown, with unity the likely loser

The fight between AFL-CIO and the Alliance for Labor Action will reach the federation convention floor in early October, probably as a demand for the expulsion of the International Chemical Workers for affiliating with ALA last week. And however the convention action goes, AFL-CIO internal unity may be the loser.

The Alliance for Labor Action is the joint enterprise of the United Auto Workers and International Brotherhood of Teamsters, both outside AFL-CIO. It's headed by Walter Reuther and the Teamsters' Frank E. Fitzsimmons, both in ill favor with the federation's president, George Meany. The ALA isn't and doesn't aspire to be a second labor federation, its founders insist. But to Meany, ALA is a Reuther vehicle for competing with AFL-CIO

Warning. Last February, Meany told the AFL-CIO executive council, "On July 23, 1968, these two organizations [the Teamsters and UAW] formed a joint venture called the Alliance for Labor Action and urged unions, whether affiliated with the federation or not, to enlist under its banner. It is apparent that the purpose . . . is the formation of a dual organization, rival to AFL-CIO."

Meany proposed and won a policy statement that: "Membership in or support of this UAW-Teamsters combine does violence to the objectives and principles of the federation as stated in its constitution, runs counter to the reciprocal constitutional pledges of its affiliates, and constitutes support for or recognition of a suspended former affiliate and an expelled former affiliate. Such membership and support by an affiliate of the AFL-CIO therefore constitutes sufficient and valid ground for suspension or explusion under the constitution of the federation."

At the time, the International Chemical Workers had taken first steps toward affiliating with ALA, and a number of other unions were considering doing so. The executive council warning effectively dammed the trickle—or flow—of AFL-CIO unions into ALA, not as an alternative to the federation but as an additional affiliation.

Sympathetic but—Faced with the threat of suspension or expulsion, AFL-CIO unions, though sympathetic toward Reuther and ALA social aims, chose the status quo in AFL-CIO to an uncertain future in ALA—an alliance that many in the federation expect will end with an eventual Teamsters withdrawal from the combination of dissimilar unions.

The United Rubber Workers, one of the unions that once appeared likely to play footsie with Reuther and ALA, apparently no longer is in the mood for flirting. At its last convention, URW's members authorized officers to attend a founding convention of ALA as observers (they didn't go because, they said, the convention was held without sufficient notice to them) but at the same time the URW members voted "overwhelmingly" against joining ALA if affiliation would in any way jeopardize their standing with AFL-CIO.

A number of AFL-CIO unions had observers at ALA's founding convention July 17, as did some independents—including the United Electrical Workers, considered a natural for ALA. However, one of the major independent unions in the telephone industry, the International Brotherhood of Telephone Workers in New England, joined ALA in late July—and has since got embroiled with AFL-CIO rivals in a number of representation elections.

ICW action. The Chemical Workers slowed down its move toward ALA in part because the union's president, Walter L. Mitchell, died during the ICW convention:

George Meany sees ALA as a rival, and is getting ready for a convention floor fight.

He had been the foremost advocate of joining ALA. His successor, Thomas E. Boyle, wasn't adverse to the alliance but more cautious about it one year ago.

Last week, Boyle announced formally in Akron that the 110,000-member union had fulfilled its "deep commitment to join the ALA in the common effort to find new ways of responding to the enormous challenges facing the labor movement today."

He also expressed a more pragmatic reason for ICW's move: "We are vitally interested in organizing the chemical industry. . . . We have received strong assurances that chemical companies will receive important attention in ALA organizing activities."

Raids? This hasn't escaped attention of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and other unions in AFL-CIO that have jurisdictions touching on those of ICW. Under the circumstances, ICW's defiance of Meany and the executive council won't be taken lightly. The federation's blunt, cigar-smoking spokesman has said several times that he personally favors "discipline" for ICW, and that he interprets the AFL-CIO constitution to call for expulsion of the union.

Beyond that, he warned the ALA—the Teamsters and Auto Workers, and now the Chemical Workers—that "anybody that tries to raid us, we'll have to raid them back. We'll have to retaliate. There's an old labor axiom that 'the raider gets raided'."

If Meany recommends ICW's ouster, the convention almost certainly will vote expulsion by the required two-thirds majority. But not all unions will be happy about doing it. There is substantial dissatisfaction with the steadily increasing centralization of power in the federation. Some unions will see an expulsion move as another barrier in the way of autonomous action by AFL-CIO affiliates.

But an unpunished ICW would certainly mean others joining with the ALA ostensibly for social and political action reasons—something irreconcilable with Meany's and AFL-CIO's concepts of ALA as dual unionism. So, insiders say, there's really no choice.

Other defections? At this point, it isn't likely that others will follow ICW's lead, although it's no secret that a number of unions would like to have one foot in Meany's AFL-CIO and the other in the 3.7-million-member ALA, to have the best of two lives.

There may be one possibility, however, if a dispute between the AFL-CIO's plumbers and its laborers gets any hotter—and perhaps insoluble. The plumbers have asked the federation's Building & Construction Trades Dept. to expel the laborers for doing work claimed by the plumbers—picking up and carrying pipe on a building site. The laborers want the plumbers kicked out for the same reason. Department officials, though admittedly worried, hope to work out a compromise.

Two things increase the interest of the laborers in ALA: The Reuther-Fitzsimmons alliance is strongly advocating more prefabricated housing—and the laborers see a possibility of more jobs for them on construction sites if factory-built housing can be erected with minimum craft requirements. Also the ALA is making a direct and strong appeal to minorities, through plans for community unions of the poor, for organizing Negroes for political action, and for programs for minority economic and social gains.

While the laborers' top leaders are close to Meany and AFL-CIO, nearly 50% of the union's rank-and-file members are Negroes with a strong leaning toward ALA and Reuther. If the jurisdictional dispute gets out of hand, the leaders might have to go along with their electorate rather than labor "executive club" friends. End

Hopes High Here In Union Drive

By HARRY MURPHY

Labor's drive to "organize the unorganized" in Atlanta with a 20-man team is headed toward success, says a union spokesman, and management, predictably, isn't overjoyed at the prospect.

"We've had a lot of response from our literature," said Jim Weaver, an international representative of the United Auto Workers Union (UAW) and head of the organizing efforts here for the Alliance for Labor Action (ALA).

"We don't even like to talk about organizing around here," said a spokesman for Rich's department store where union workers passed out literature at entrances.

"I TRUST THAT for the good of the workers and the community . . . I just don't understand them . . . I never have had dealings with men of that type," said the president of Auto-Soler, Inc., at the Great Southwest Industrial District visited by the organizers last week.

The ALA is an effort of UAW, the Teamsters Union and the International Chemical Workers Union to, in their words, "bring union organization to the millions of unorganized workers and to make the benefits of collective bargaining available to them."

The campaign in Atlanta, the initial effort in a nationwide drive, began Thursday with organizers visiting six industrial parks in the area, the union's first priority because of some 50,000 unorganized workers employed there.

Mathis said the unions' effort is not aimed at any particular company at present. "We'll take the companies where we get the best response and our panel will decide where to concentrate our efforts," he added.

"We're not out necessarily to organize the department stores, but if we get a good response from them we might go in," said the ALA spokesman.

He said all 20 of the organizers are local people, experienced in local organizing efforts, who were pulled from their jobs and put on the drive because they know the local labor situation "and what needs to be done."

"We got a very nice response from management and they took our literature," Mathis said. "Of course none of them have come to us asking us to organize their plants, but they want to keep up with what's going on, too."

THE CONCENTRATED effort here has led to speculation that ALA is putting most of its eggs in the Atlanta basket and that a successful drive here would be held up as an example to organizers elsewhere.

"I'll say this," Mathis said, "I'm confident of a successful drive here."

He said organizing efforts at each company will be assigned to one of the three unions in the ALA, unless others join the effort, and workers will be told to which union they have been assigned before a drive begins.

Frank Carter, president of the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce, said the drive hasn't come to the attention of any chamber committees. "We have had a lot of things on our mind, but that hasn't been one of emphasis," he said.

In another opinion Monday Bolton informed the State Department of Industry and Trade it cannot spend any state funds in connection with the 28th annual convention of the Southeastern Association of State Highway Officials.

COMPTROLLER RICHARD Millsaps of the I&T department had written Bolton saying his department had been requested to spend $2,800 to provide a caterer for a tea at the governor's mansion, transportation between the convention site and the mansion and a box of fruit cake and brief case for each conventioneer.

Bolton noted that a 1968 constitutional amendment allows the department to spend funds for meals and incidentals of "bona fide industrial prospects and other persons who attend any meeting at the request of the department to discuss the location or development of new business, industry or tourism within the state."

Then he added it did not appear the highway officials fit either of those categories. "Consequently," he concluded, "it is my opinion that none of the above expenses may be borne by the Department of Industry and Trade."

ALA

UAW's Jim Schuetz

Organizing easier years ago, but ALA-Atlanta is on the move

Jim Schuetz won his organizing stars years ago when the issues were "more clear cut" and workers didn't offer too much resistance to unions.

"But things have changed considerably," he said the other day in ALA's Atlantic office." Employers are still as stubborn as ever, but they are a hell of a lot more sophisticated."

ALA is the Alliance or Labor Action and the speaker is an organizing coordinator for the United Auto Workers (UAW). He's spending several days a week in Atlanta trying to help get ALA's first area organizing drive off the ground.

Jim's been working with Bill Genoese of the Teamsters in a coordinated drive to bring Atlanta area unorganized workers into the Labor Movement.

Early success has been excellent, says Schuetz who points out that 10 plants representing 14 workers have been organized since the project got underway last Labor Day.

"It's still too early to tell," he said in his understated way," but I think we are going to be successful in proving that our approach will get results."

Schuetz explains that ALA leaders chose Atlanta for three basic reasons: "UAW, Teamsters and the ICWU have a base of about 39,000 members in the area; the community is one of the most progressive in the South and there are still thousands of workers who need a union."

ALA's approach is to immerse itself completely in the community, Schuetz declares. "We've spent considerable time contacting religious, political and other community leaders to let them know we've set up an office and that we are interested in the total community, not just the organization of workers."

Genoese and Schuetz have been very active working with Atlanta's civil rights organizations. Julian Bond, famed black civi leader in Atlanta (he was tapped for the vice presidential nomination at the Democratic Convention in 1968) played a vital role recently in organizing 800 workers at Dobbs House, the airport cafeteria. (See story above.) Most of the workers are black and Bond talked a lot about employer exploitation.

Church leaders have received a lot of attention, says Schuetz. "We've been delighted with their response and I think they are in full accord with ALA's goals for Atlanta workers."

Contacts in plants have been developed as a result of the cooperation of these leaders who are convinced that the Alliance wants to continue to play an aggressive, progressive role in the total community, according to Schuetz.

"It hasn't been easy, says Jim, who thinks employers don't give you as much help these days.

"Years ago they'd make some overt dumb move that would prove to workers they needed a union."

"It's changed for the most part," he says, "although once and a while we still find an employer who presents us with an overwhelming issue."

"Unions have to work harder to convince potential members. We must provide reasons for organization and we must, if we are to be successful, encourage community leaders to help us make our case."

Schuetz firmly believes the ALA is doing the kinds of things it takes to organize workers today. "We'll be in business for a long time because we think we've developed modern approach to worker's problems. Time will tell.' I think the early results are an important indication we're on the right track."

Schuetz, 51, is a low-keyed veteran of the UAWR staff who grew up in Tonawanda, N.Y., but shows traces of a Midwest accent as the result of living in Ohio and Michigan since 1954.

He's a member of Vice President Pat Greathouse's organizing staff and formerly served as assistant director of the union's skilled trades department.

In 1961, Schuetz set up the UAW's first program for its new skilled trades group. He's spent a great deal of his time in the past few years helping Greathouse negotiate contracts for members who work in the agricultural implements industry with special emphasis on the skilled trades people.

He's a tool and die maker by profession and plied his trade for Bell Aircraft Company from 1940 to '52 (with time out for military service), where he first joined the Auto Workers. As a member of Local 501 he recalls, he was actively involved in a "nasty strike," in '49. He was fired for his activities but got his job back when the strike ended.

Local 501 was a good place to learn about trade unionism Schuetz remembers with a smile. "About every shade of political opinion was represented, from Communist to Conservative, and we used to have some of the wildest meetings you ever saw."

He doesn't remember being an intense political activist until "after the strike."

"I learned how much I needed a union," he says now.

In 1952, he joined the UAW staff and helped organize shops in New York and Pennsylvania.

In 1954 he was moved to Northwest Ohio where he continued to achieve considerable success on the organizing front. His associates call him a natural Organizer "one of the very best in the UAW."

'Hard hitting' effort is key to ALA win

A "rock-em, sock-em" organizing drive by the Alliance for Labor Action is credited for a resounding win for the ALA in Atlanta, Ga.

The ALA "Project Atlanta" team recently organized some 700 employes of the Dobbs House restaurant chain in the huge Atlanta airport.

According to William Genoese, Teamster executive director of the Atlanta ALA activities, "this win shows what a truthful, honest and hard-hitting drive can accomplish."

"The unified drive put on by the three ALA unions—the Teamsters, the United Auto Workers and the Chemical Workers—was in great part responsible for the victory."

The management of the firm challenged the outcome of the election on a variety of points after the employes voted 389 to 106 for union representation.

The company offered four handbills as "evidence," according to the report. One complained the ALA used Julian Bond, noted civil rights figure and Georgia state legislator, to "inflame racial hostility among the Dobbs House employes."

Another handbill the company objected to included a drawing of a man called "The Man." It showed a man carrying two large sacks of money and said, "Stop the Chiseler."

The company charged the ALA "raised the issue of racial discrimination to incite hostility and illegally coerce the employes in the freedom of choice during the election period."

The regional director, in denying the company complains of racial overtones, said, "Under all the circumstances attendant to this campaign, and the important fact that the majority of the employes are Negro, it is my opinion that the union propaganda conceiveably racially oriented, WAS NOT DESIGNED TO INFLAME RACIAL HATRED, but rather DESIGNED TO ENCOURAGE RACIAL ECONOMIC BETTERMENT THROUGH CONCERTED ACTIVITY.

"Moreover, the literature distributed by the union does not appear to be a deliberate attempt to invoke the racial hatred of the Negro employes for white people, rather it was designed to engender racial self-consciousness."

ALA helps tenant union win long rent strike

Could be there was never a bargaining session like it before.

And when it was over, the longest rent strike in the nation's history—affecting some 10,000 St. Louis families—virtually made those tenants their own landlords.

Out of it all was born the Alliance for Labor Action's first community offspring. And what a healthy youngster!

A year ago in January, tenants in nine St. Louis public housing projects struck against rent increases.

For 10 months, there was no progress toward settlement until one day in mid-October when UAW Region 5 Director Ken Worley and Harold Gibbons, president of Teamsters Joint Council No. 13, decided on an "ALA-style" approach which would involve men and women of goodwill from all parts of the St .Louis community.

Call on ALA

Into Gibbons' office came a delegation of rent strikers and representatives from industry, labor, religion and education.

One was John Joseph Cardinal Carberry who wrote to his parishoners: "It was indeed both a job and a privilege for Bishop McNicholas and myself to be among those present and the three-hour discussion gave me a visible proof of the splendid spirit which characterizes St. Louis."

That community spirit—mobilized and aimed at solving human problems—is what ALA is all about.

Gibbons was chosen president of the new St. Louis Civic Alliance for Housing whose avowed purpose is to meet head-on the problems of the poor living in public housing. Worley is on the board of directors.

When negotiations with public housing authorities ended, Richard Baron, attorney for the strikers, held up the contract and said: "There is no question about it. This document is revolutionary in the field of housing in the U.S."

Win Representation

With the end of the strike, Alliance leaders were on hand when Mayor Alfonso J. Cervantes swore in three black housing commissioners and two whites—tenants—and on-looking strikers cheered. Some were in tears.

Details of the agreement:

- Rent will be pegged to a maximum of 25 per cent of tenant income. It had ranged as high as 70 per cent in some welfare cases. Rent for an unemployed family will be a maximum of $20 a month, irrespective of the size of their apartment.
- An elected Tenant Affairs Board becomes a court of last resort in housing authority.
- Tenant-management corporations will take complete responsibility for administering housing projects.

Washington Post Reporter Robert Maynard, when it was all over, reached this conclusion: "The big breakthrough for St. Louis, which has one of the most severe housing shortages of low-income housing in the nation, was the creation of the Civic Alliance for Housing."

"Shortly after the turn of the century," noted BLS, "only 3 in every 10 workers were in service industries. By 1950, the weight had shifted to just over 5 in every 10 in service industry; by 1968 the proportion had inched to 6 in every 10. In 1980, close to 7 in every 10 workers—or 68 million—are projected to be in service industries."

Employment in transportation, communications and public utilities is expected to increase to 5 million in 1980, up from 4.5 million in 1968.

BLS commented: "Even though employment in trucking and air transportation has expanded, the decline in railroad employment has been severe enough to cause an overall decline in the average for all transportation industries. But, a turnaround is expected: trucking and air transportation will increase fast enough to offset whatever further small railroad declines occur . . ."

Government employment is expected to total 16.8 million by 1980; agriculture will continue to drop as will mining; construction work will gain to nearly 5.5 million. Manufacturing, now accounting for 20 million jobs, will increase to about 22.4 million at the end of this decade.

In terms of occupational groups:

- Professional, technical and kindred will increase to 15.5 million.
- Managers, officials and proprietors will increase to 9.5 million.
- Clerical will increase to 17.3 million.
- Sales will increase to 6 million.
- Craftsmen, foremen and kindred will rise to 12.2 million.
- Semiskilled workers will increase to 15.4 million.
- Non-farm laborers will drop to about 3.7 million.
- Farm workers will continue their decline to 2.6 million.
- Service workers will jump to 13.1 million at a rate of increase more than half again as fast as the rate projected for total employment.

50,000-Member Distributive Workers Admitted into Alliance Membership

The National Council, Distributive Workers of America (NCDWA), with a membership of 50,000 workers, has joined the Alliance for Labor Action.

Announcement of the NCDWA membership in ALA was made by ALA Co-Chairmen, Teamster General Vice President Frank E. Fitzsimmons and UAW President Walter P. Reuther.

"NCDWA is a union which expresses perfectly the youthful spirit of the Alliance for Labor Action," declared the ALA co-leaders. "We are delighted to welcome them to the Alliance and pledge our full moral and financial support to help continue the impressive start they have made toward bringing the essential benefits of trade unionism to millions of disadvantaged workers in America."

NCDWA leaders Cleveland Robinson, President, David Livingston, Executive Vice President, and Frank Brown, Organizing Director, said they regard "our union's affiliation with the ALA a major step forward in our continuing search to upgrade NCDWA's basic ability to help the nation's most needy workers to a better, more secure and dignified life.

"We are fully in accord with ALA's advanced approach to meeting the most serious problems facing America and its workers," they said, "and we believe NCDWA can make a modest but significant contribution in helping the working poor organize themselves."

Currently represented in 14 states, NCDWA is in the midst of a massive organizing drive among the nation's working poor. In the past ten months, 10,000 workers have joined the locals which comprise NCDWA.

Robinson is also secretary-treasurer of District 65 which represents about 30,000 workers in the Metropolitan New York area. Mr. Livingston is President of District 65, and Brown directs "65's" organizational activities.

NCDWA currently represents workers in New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, Michigan, Pennsylvania, Arizona, California, Illinois, and Kansas.

The union's racial mix at the leadership level is well balanced and fairly reflects a membership that is estimated to include about 40 percent black and Puerto Rican workers.

Alliance for Labor Action Seen Stricken By Ill It Was Formed to Fight—Lethargy

By ELLIOT CARLSON
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON —The fledgling Alliance for Labor Action—formed by the United Auto Workers and the Teamsters union to "revitalize" the labor movement—is itself threatened by a precocious sort of atrophy.

That's the view of many labor observers who have had 18 months to assess the ALA, founded to undertake numerous social-action programs for the poor. But these observers have concluded that the much-ballyhooed alliance hasn't lived up to advance billings.

Clearly, the ALA is plagued by many woes. Among them: Signs that at least one of four member unions may withdraw; mounting internal criticism over the pace of the ALA's progress, and shrinking funds for the ALA from the 2.1 million-member Teamsters union and the 1.4 million-member UAW, the nation's largest unions.

That isn't all. From its inception the ALA has been hampered by leadership troubles. The parent unions have yet to agree on a single director for the joint venture, which has creaked along uneasily under a set of UAW and Teamster co-directors. A much-trumpeted strike fund never was established. And it was 16 months before the customary union newspaper made its appearance.

Some labor sources even have been speculating that with the death early this year of Walter Reuther, UAW president and prime mover behind the organization, the ALA's days are numbered. "For Reuther the ALA was a way to spite Meany and show how stodgy the AFL-CIO had gotten," says one long-time labor observer. "But with Reuther gone, part of the ALA's reason for being is gone." The late Mr. Reuther had spurred creation of the ALA after quarreling with George Meany, the AFL-CIO president; the UAW pulled out of the AFL-CIO in 1968.

Some Success in Atlanta

To be sure, the picture isn't entirely bleak. The ALA's organizing drive in Atlanta has yielded some modest returns. A few of the social-action programs over which the alliance has spread about $1 million seem to be showing results.

Some labor sources say the ALA is in trouble simply because it committed itself to an impossibly ambitious set of goals. According to its prospectus, the ALA was to develop low-cost urban housing for slum dwellers, sponsor antipoverty programs, mobilize ghetto residents into community unions and organize unrepresented workers in low-wage industries into ALA unions.

But despite some recent signs of movement in these areas, few UAW men profess satisfaction with the ALA's performance. Some say that once the UAW's long strike with General Motors Corp. is completely settled, the union will begin a full-scale review of where the ALA has been and where it's going.

"The alliance is moving ahead at a slower rate than we expected," concedes Douglas Fraser, a UAW vice president. He blames this on repeated distractions, such as strikes and other troubles that have plagued both the UAW and Teamsters in the past year.

Bu outside sources believe ALA troubles go deeper, refelcting the often-conflicting styles and interests of the parent unions. This summer, questions about the ALA's future were raised when the UAW and Teamsters halved per capita payments to the ALA to five cents a month. The two other ALA members followed suit. The move was attributed to UAW financial problems and massive expenditures for the UAW's Walter and May Reuther Family Education Center at Black Lake, Mich.

Ill Omen Seen

ALA officials insist the reduction hasn't affected any of the alliance's activities or produced any cuts in its 50-man staff. Indeed, they suggest that, with $2 million in its treasury, the ALA was receiving more money than it needed. But some observers believe the fund cut bodes ill for the infant labor group.

"It would be embarrassing for the two giant unions to kill the ALA outright," says one veteran labor observer. "No doubt they've decided to let it slide quietly into nonexistence."

But there are indications that, rather than fade away, the ALA may break up. Originally, the alliance was to have been an umbrella organization for a wide range of unions committed to ALA objectives. But other unions haven't joined since April, when the 50,000-member Distributive Workers of America affiliated. Last year, the 110,000-member International Chemical Workers Union became the ALA's first recruit. The union then was expelled by the AFL-CIO, which has viewed the ALA as a rival federation.

Recently relations between ALA members have been severely strained. One reason is reports that the UAW—and possibly even the Teamsters—might be moving to patch up differences with the AFL-CIO. Labor sources comment that any resumption in formal ties between these unions—even though a long way off—would leave the Distributive Workers and the Chemical Workers essentially isolated.

To head off this possibility, the Chemical Workers at their October convention authorized the executive board to pull out of the ALA at any time it thought necessary. At present, ICWU officials say they are evaluating the union's place in the ALA. Some insiders believe a decision to pull out of the alliance may be made as early as January, when the ICWU executive board next meets.

Chemical Workers' Worries

Reasons for the Chemical Workers union's unhappiness aren't hard to find. The ICWU president, Thomas E. Boyle, told convention delegates: "If either the Teamsters or Auto Workers should return to the AFL-CIO we could be left out in the cold. We could be subject to raids (on membership) across the country without any protection whatsoever."

At the same time, Mr. Boyle complained that affiliation with the ALA hadn't increased the ICWU's rank-and-file membership. He also grumbled that in some cases local Teamsters had refused to honor ICWU picket lines.

These troubles aside, ALA officials insist at least some of their efforts are beginning to pay off. They cite the ALA's organizing drive in Atlanta, where the alliance has won 52 of 78 representation elections since September 1969. This means some 5,000 workers have been organized into ALA member unions. Eight elections are pending involving 2,642 workers and the ALA currently is working on 140 sites in the Atlanta area with a potential of 12,000 members, they add.

While such results are unimpressive by the standards of other areas, they amount to a modest achievement in the South, labor organizers concede.

Effect of $1 Million

ALA sources also assert that the $1 million the alliance has spread over some 20 projects proves that organization isn't as dormant as critics contend. They say the ALA has:

—Organized tenants of the St. Louis Housing Authority into a trade-union-like organization; the authority adds a monthly charge onto each tenant's rent to finance running the group much in the way employers check off union dues from wages. The ALA gave the tenant's group $50,000 to finance legal and other technical services to help it in its dealings with the authority.

—Provided funds to cover office space and utilities of the Southern Mutual Help Association. The group, functioning in eight Louisiana parishes, offers credit-union services and a self-help housing program and attempts to organize farm workers into trade unions.

—Granted monthly sums of $3,000 to the North Jersey Community Union, a group which, occupying an abandoned brewery, provides legal services, day-care facilities and job training programs for Newark ghetto residents.

—Extended $39,000 to Mexican-American residents near McAllen, Texas, for construction of a medical center. The facility is being built on 10 acres of land acquired by the ALA, which has deeded part of it over to the Texas branch of Cesar Chavez's United Farm Workers union.

ALA spokesmen assert that such examples demonstrate the UAW and Teamsters "are getting along well." Indeed, a visitor to the alliance's posh eight-room suite here in Washington finds representatives from the two unions working together in comparative harmony. The appearance of unity was enhanced recently when the Teamsters advanced the UAW a $25 million line of credit for use in its long strike against General Motors.

But occasionally the ALA's workings have been impeded by the divergent styles of the two big unions. The UAW is highly centralized, makes decisions easily and has a yen for publicity. But the Teamsters union—at least without its former chief, James Hoffa—is more decentralized and requires many moves to be approved by sometimes conflicting baronies of power. It's also highly suspicious of the press.

At times the two unions have clashed on matters of substance, as in the Salinas Valley where the UAW backed Cesar Chavez's effort to organize vegetable workers. This brought both the UAW and the AFL-CIO-affiliated United Farm Workers into conflict with the Teamsters, which in August signed contracts with a number of growers. Eventually, a compromise was worked out, but not before the UAW and Teamsters were embroiled in, as one UAW source put it, "serious arguments."

Observers believe these and other strains eventually may prove too much for the maverick alliance.

Teamster Drivers Capture Four Truck Roadeo Titles

Four Teamsters Union members, all proven drivers of safety and skill on the road, won championships at the National Truck Roadeo held recently in Miami Beach, Fla.

The combined on-the-job record of the Teamsters and a non-union winner underscored the experience that helped them take class trophies in the competition: A total of 77 years and five million miles of accident-free driving, over-the-road and in the cities.

The title winners were:

Straight truck—Cletus Frank of Teamster Local 391 in Greensboro, N.C., a driver for Akers Motor Lines.

3-axle—Marvin Harris of Teamster Local 71 in Charlotte, N.C., a driver for Johnson Motor Lines.

4-axle—Peter Granello of Teamster Local 560 in Union City, N.J., a driver for Mason & Dixon Lines.

5-axle—Paul D. Good of Teamster Local 413 in Columbus, O., a driver for Suburban Motor Freight.

Tank truck—William Hannibal, Jr., a driver for Esso-Indiana in Baltimore, Md.

While the National Truck Roadeo, sponsored by the American Trucking Assns., Inc., traditionally has no "grand champion," Cletus Frank came as close as possible to filling that role in this year's competition.

Frank did something no other driver ever has done in the 30-year history of the roadeo as he won an unprecedented fifth championship in the straight truck class. He also won in 1961, 1963, 1964 and 1967.

Granello's championship in the 4-axle class was his third title in the national competition.

Good's victory was his second crown in the 5-axle division.

While the driving competition was the major phase of the roadeo, contestants also took a written examination on the trucking industry, safety rules, fire-fighting and first-aid.

They also were tested with a "pre-trip inspection" examination in which they were challenged to detect planted defects in equipment such as non-functioning lights and loose wheel lugs.

Besides their enormous trophies, the winners also received money prizes.

The 1971 National Truck Roadeo has been scheduled for Houston, Tex.

Shop Steward Completes Labor Course

Lucille Goodman Johnson, a shop steward for Teamster Local 832 in New York City, was a graduate in the first class of its kind from the 2-year labor and liberal arts program of the New York State School of Industrial and Labor Relations at Cornell University.

Lucille G. Johnson

Mrs. Johnson was one of 75 students receiving a diploma for the course. Her student colleagues included 20 presidents of local unions, three international union vice presidents, and a large number of business representatives and other officials from trade unions in the area.

Strike Wins Pact Gains In Missouri

Some 50 members of Teamster Local 574 of Cape Girardeau, Mo., won a 3-year contract providing substantial wage gains and other improvements after a 3-week strike at Stites Concrete, Inc., of Dexter, Mo.

Local 574 won a National Labor Relations Board representation election at the company last June and the walkout began when the company refused to budge during negotiations on the initial contract.

Thomas Edwards, Local 574 secretary-treasurer, said wage gains were made retroactive to last July 25th. The agreement also provided holidays, vacation schedules, hospitalization, and other items standard in Teamsters Union agreements.

First-Year Report

5,300 Workers Go Union In ALA Organizing Drive

First-year organizing efforts in Georgia by the Alliance for Labor Action resulted in more than 50 representation election victories in which more than 5,300 workers decided they wanted to work under a union contract.

The campaign results scored by the Teamsters Union, United Auto Workers and other affiliates of the ALA were considered remarkable in view of the fact that Georgia has long been a staunch "right-to-work" state.

Teamster General Vice President Frank E. Fitzsimmons, head of the ALA organizing program, hailed the achievement as one in which, for the first time, collective bargaining rights have been brought to thousands of workers laboring under the depressing handicaps of inadequate wages and poor working conditions.

He added: "ALA is keeping its commitments to upgrade working and living conditions for masses of people in the face of all kinds of opposition."

Fitzsimmons, noting that the ALA campaign has been operating from Atlanta only a year, declared: "The pilot program is now off the ground and detailed surveys are being made in other cities as the second phase of the operation gets underway."

Since the organizing drive began a year ago, the Teamster local unions have scored 32 election victories covering 3,969 workers; UAW local unions have scored 17 wins affecting 1,296 workers, and the International Chemical Workers Union has tallied two successes for 50 workers.

The scorecard shows the ALA group setting a winning mark of nearly 66 per cent—far above the national average—as 51 wins were gained against 26 losses in representation election balloting.

The most recent wins were scored at Voit Rubber, Air Treads, Combustion Engineering, Cathcart Storage and W. W. Grainger Co.

Some campaigns are still in limbo. The ICWU, narrowly out-voted at Dowling Textile Co., filed charges and won an order from the NLRB regional office in Atlanta to set aside the election and set a new date for another ballot. The company has appealed the case to the Board in Washington, D.C.

● Office Win

Office workers employed by Signal Delivery Service, Inc., of Evansville, Ind., voted unanimously for representation by Teamster Local 215 in a recent National Labor Relations Board election, according to James R. Foster, secretary-treasurer of the local union.

150 Workers At Air India Go Teamster

The Teamsters Union Airline Division recently was certified by the National Mediation Board as bargaining representative for more than 150 workers employed by Air India.

An election conducted by the NMB resulted in a vote of 58 for the Teamsters, 20 for the Transport Workers Union AFL-CIO, and nine ballots were voided. A total of 154 workers were eligible to vote.

Henry Breen, director of the IBT Airline Division, said the bargaining unit includes clerical and office workers, and fleet and passenger service employees.

Free Hoffa

Individuals and Organizations Working for Jimmy's Release

Throughout the country, there is growing activity on the part of private citizens and union members to secure a pardon for Teamster General President James R. Hoffa.

Wives of Teamsters are visiting their Congressional delegations. Teamster local unions are sponsoring letter writing campaigns to the White House urging Hoffa's pardon.

Typical of activity outside the Teamsters is the campaign of the Michigan State Building and Construction Trades Council, AFL-CIO.

The Council is furnishing petitions with a resolution calling for Hoffa's release. The petitions ask the bearer to secure five signatures and return the petition to the Council for forwarding to the White House. A headline above the petition says, "Sign and Bring Jimmy Hoffa Home for Christmas."

The Council takes the same position as the International Brotherhood of Teamsters that this is not a labor matter. It is one of concern to all citizens who believe every American, whether poor or rich, helpless or influential, anonymous or controversial as Jimmy Hoffa obviously was, is entitled to the same standard of justice and elementary decency as the least influential among Americans.

We in the Teamsters believe Jimmy Hoffa should receive a Christmas pardon from President Nixon, believing the President would increase his stature by so doing.

Workers, both union and non-union, have received many benefits from Hoffa's union activities in bringing about better living standards for millions of American families.

There is that old maxim that a 'friend in need is a friend, indeed,' and Teamsters everywhere are urged to write to the White House asking for Jimmy's release in time for him to be home for Christmas.

Farm Workers

By REV. JAMES L. DRAKE

Soon it will be nine years since Cesar and Helen moved to Delano to "build a union for farm workers." In retrospect, the move demanded such faith and audacity that it is a wonder that one family would summon the courage to begin. Think about it! Several million workers hounded by hunger, excluded from most basic rights guaranteed laboring men in this nation, and one family says, "Well, there should be a union, so let's build one."

The events of those nine years form compact lessons in organizing. Few revolutionary efforts are initiated and carried to fruition in this day of the OEO and other pseudo-movements. But, here is a drive that is succeeding and which has not destroyed itself through internal friction.

So what are the lessons?

First, and simply, one must begin! Oak trees do not grow where no acorns are planted. In 1961, men sat at bars and argued how to build a farm workers' union. Students even went so far as to make erudite studies of the matter. But Cesar and Helen got the revolutionary idea that the wisest way to get from point A to point B was to take step one . . . they moved to Delano.

There seems to be much pessimism about the possibility of change. And yet there is such a flood of talk about revolution and radical movements. I wonder if there has ever been in our nation such a turgid situation. There is vast willingness on the part of many to consider experiment. Yet, few are taking the concrete step of "moving to Delano"—or wherever.

Cesar and Helen make a bold organizational suggestion. Their life is their lesson. People will follow if you are willing to show direction. The Chavez' seem to place a tremendous responsibility on our shoulders. They say to radicals everywhere: "Don't talk; act! You'll be surprised by the results."

It is clear now why Cesar was so cautious about the source of financial support in the pre-strike years. Even his closest friends could seldom convince him to accept five dollars for food. His reasoning: "If the workers really want what I am offering, they will pay for it through dues." Often enough it appeared the workers did not want what he offered. In the winter of 1963, the family suffered greatly. But the principle worked. The workers shaped the organization by telling what they needed. What they didn't need, they didn't buy. Thus, to give, the organizer must first be at the other's mercy. By asking for workers' money to build the organization, Cesar was forming hundreds of partnerships.

To formalize these partnerships, nothing served better than the Credit Union. The trust built through that mechanism was a lasting glue. Such trust was absolutely necessary for confrontation with the growers. I believe that much of the spirit of mutual assistance which bore the grape strikers through five years of suffering was born in the Credit Union. Firm organization requires a sound structure, and the Credit Union has served as the structural steel of the Union.

Many times we try to take short-cuts, launching grand organizational schemes, demanding firm underpinnings, as though people cluster together as simply as tiny magnets. But the history of the farm workers' union-building shows how needed is attention to the details of trust-building. The organization which seeks to build new and freer forms of community must begin and grow as a family, teaching and trusting each newly added member. Officers, boards, trustees—these are mere formalities. Economic interdependence and personal trust are the real source of strength in a confrontation with freedom-robbing powers.

Organizations that are lasting are built as a pyramid. One block must be

New Drive To Organize Working Poor

By PAT JORDAN

Recently Honore Daumier's moving etching "If the workers fight, how shall the house be built?" appeared in a New York exhibition. While the etching is concerned with man's violence, its question is well taken. Could it be that wars and confrontation issue not only from politicians' gimmickry but also from the thirst of poor and just men for equanimity? The question is self-answering.

Since its inception, the Catholic Worker has shown a dedication to the plight of the poor. This has not been restricted to place or nationality, color or religion. And it has embodied allegiances with other groups seeking the alleviation of class and economic struggle. There has not been a univocal endorsement of all such groups' means on the part of the CW, and when there was not, such was generally made clear in these pages. (You will note the July-August issue's approach to the Black Panther Party.) Now, happily, we bring to your attention the ordered struggle of the working poor under the National Council of Distributive Workers of America.

The NCDWA was constituted at Suffolk Va. on May 4, 1969. Many of its members had or were about to disaffiliate themselves from the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, AFL-CIO, on grounds that it did not practically represent them, nor did its leadership respond to the union's large minority constituencies. As Cleveland Robinson, an official of distinguished District 65 in New York City, said to the founding conference of NCDWA, "We know there are millions of unorganized workers in this country and a highly disproportionate number of them are black and Spanish-speaking.

Drive To Organize Working Poor

. . . They have been left out of the mainstream of society, and the labor movement as a whole, with rare exceptions, has ignored them. That is why there are now 57,000,000 unorganized workers in America." And he continued, "So we have to form an organization that is new and different, one that will fight racism in all its forms. . . . Our union must be a home for the poor—blacks, whites, Spanish-speaking, and others. We extend our hand of brotherhood and friendship to all. They want to be organized. . . . The one thing that holds them back is their distrust of the labor movement as exemplified by its present leadership." This is the avowed purpose of NCDWA: to organize the unorganized workers, especially to organize the working poor.

Representatives of the eleven locals which had disaffiliated from RWDSU to form NCDWA elected Mr. Robinson as the National Council's first president. He spoke for them when he had said to RWDSU, "We need friendship and we value friendship, but we do not propose to sacrifice principles." And so a new chapter in American Labor history began.

Not only did a new chapter ensue for labor, but a new turn was taking place in the American civil rights movement, what J. H. O'Dell calls the legacy of the Poor People's Campaign (Freedomways, Third Quarter 1969, p. 197ff). Such groups as SCLC had finally come to realize that the only way to defeat poverty was to organize the poor, and let them apply the lance. There was developing a united front of unions and civil rights organizations, much to the satisfaction of the poor.

Clay Stout of District 65 put it to me this way. Once there was a mosquito (labor) and an elephant (business). The mosquito would periodically and predictably attack the elephant's hide with a somewhat measured bite, which of course would move the elephant with entirely too foreseeable a progress. One day a bumblebee (the movement for minorities' rights) entered the picture. This bee, from every engineering standpoint incapable of flight, zeroed in and gave the elephant a momentous thrust on the trunk. The mosquito, hidden at the elephant's other end, thought his own nibble had caused the elephant too powerful a jolt. He immediately besought the elephant's pardon. This is the meaning of the tale: if the bee and the mosquito (the movements of minority rights and labor) were to get together instead of going at the establishment (elephant) alone and at opposite ends, they would probably move that elephant far more quickly, seriously, and efficiently.

It is of the utmost importance then that in the historic hospital strike of Charleston, S.C. (spring, 1969) we note the strong presence of both the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and the NCDWA. Thanks to their cooperation and inspiration, this strike of poor workers was won in three months against the serious odds of an aristocratic power structure and the force of a reactionary state. (For a better understanding of the cooperation between SCLC and labor in the Charleston strike, see O'Dell's article mentioned above.)

Not only was the strike won, but soon employees at Ideal White Swan, the largest laundry in Charleston, had organized, struck and won, and some 250 workers in three city departments (Sanitation, Water Works, and Engineering) were gathering to represent their plight before the city government.

The sanitation strike of Charleston followed directly on the victory of the hospital strikers and took on some bizarre episodes. The mayor of Charleston, for example, pressed into service fifty convicts, policemen and prison guards carrying shotguns to collect the city's refuse. When the strike ended some six weeks later on Nov. 3, workers who had previously been receiving between $45-$62 for six days work were making from $68-$76 (it's now beyond $81) for working five days a week. More importantly, they were granted paid vacations, overtime pay, and a grievance procedure. Cleveland Robinson seemed vindicated that "the war on poverty can only be won by organized workers."

At the same time strikes were undertaken by local unions of the NCDWA all over the South, from Memphis, Tenn. to Newport News, Va., to Atlanta, Ga. The Distributive Worker, national publication of the NCDWA (which comes out of District 65's offices in NYC) follows these proceedings with the loyalty of a fraternal journal, and the gains of the strikes appear in its pages.

Perhaps the most publicized of these strikes has been the Obeci Memorial Hospital strike of Suffolk, Va. It lasted for over six months, and although it was ultimately sabotaged when strikers allegedly resorted to violence, it had progressed sufficiently to the point of developing local leadership and putting three solid wage increases in the strikers' pockets. As any union man will tell you, that must be considered a victory. The tangibles are most important, no matter what documents and signatures may or may not have been lacking.

In May of 1970, the SCLC, NCDWA, and ALA (Alliance For Labor Action) rallied in Atlanta in the March Against Racism, War, and Repression. This was a visible display that labor and civil rights groups were finally working in earnest to conduct their own war on poverty. During the Charleston hospital strike the ALA had come to the assistance of Local 1199B with $25,000, and when the NCDWA had joined the ALA in April, 1970, a joint statement of Teamster Vice-President Frank Fitzsimmons and UAW President Walter Reuther pledged full "moral and financial support to help continue the impressive start they (NCDWA) have made toward bringing the essential benefits of trade unionism to millions of disadvantaged workers in America."

Another sidelight in these actions was the growing activity of Churches in behalf of workers' rights. During the Suffolk hospital strike, for example, union representatives had been attending white churches to distribute literature. Later, in many cases, it was ministers who took part in the proceedings of settlement.

The struggle of the poor people to gain their rightful wages and dignity cannot be applauded enough. The rise of militant local leadership (for example Mary Moultrie of Local 1199B), the organizing of workers in areas of "essential service," the working of the bumblebee and the mosquito together, the benefits in dignity, wages, and security plans that have come to thousands of the "working poor," the realization that black people cannot rely on a black capitalism as corrosive as its white counterpart, and the vitality that has emanated from communities organized for specific purposes, makes the movement of the NCDWA and the SCLC one of the brightest in the field of social improvement and human rights. If this movement can grow with the momentum of the Farm Workers' victory, perhaps there is hope that a mass mobilization of America's poor will persuade this nation to make a real commitment to the abolition of poverty. Then the workingmen will not have to fight. They will be content to build.

firmly placed before a higher one can be planted on it. Goals for the farm workers' union are always reachable—and from the workers' point of view, immediately worthwhile. A progressive pattern was developed: a Credit Union and a death benefit insurance led to a tiny cooperative. Disability insurance case-work led to quiet moves to stop unscrupulous labor contractors. Efforts to curb labor contractors led to a drive to keep rents low in crumbling labor camps, which ultimately led to the first direct and open confrontation: The Limell-Woodville Rent Strike. To consider jumping from the Credit Union step to the rent strike would have been folly. Organization means progression.

The grape strike had its seeds both in the Fillipino workers' strike in Coachella in 1965 and in the rent strike. In August, 1965, Linnell camp rent strikers employed in the vineyards of the J.D. Martin Ranch, struck for $1.40. For the first time, the world "Huelga" rang out.

We must learn to organize. It is an art, not an accident. The progression must be intentional and not accidental if the organizing is to reach its goal: power.

Finally, Cesar's work shows something of what is demanded in order to be a leader. One who leads encourages followers to experiment, once the goal is defined. The leader who demands perfect results the first time has not himself learned from experience. All who have shared the joy of serving the farm workers' movement have learned that one is seldom criticized for making mistakes. Rather, we feel the heat when we fail to take a step toward B and simply lounge around on A. Inaction is not tolerated.

The burden of change rests on the shoulders of many. UFWOC leaders are instructed not to horde responsibility, but rather to encourage masses to become involved. That is the secret of the grape boycott's success, and that is why the lettuce boycott will build power. Many boycotters are not workers. All of us are responsible for the suffering of the rural poor. It was our votes that kept the workers excluded from protective legislation. We are guilty. Cesar has always emphasized that correction of the wrong is not the sole responsibility of the worker. The worker must strike and lead, but any and everyone who cares is welcomed to join la causa. Perhaps this strategy, more than any other, has served to build that strange, beautiful conglomerate of people who have merged to bring long-denied justice to rural workers. And that is one lesson for all to behold: The liberation of the enslaved, if done for more than mere economic purpose, cannot help but liberate many more of us, whose identity has been categorized with that of the Slavemaster.

They are advertised, I think, in this issue.

impossible within a corrupt institution. Their position is that the institution has lost credibility as a useful empirical agent of the Spirit. They say this because they have ceasd to have confidence in the Pope and the hierarchy. So they find themselves at odds with the visible, institutional structures of the Church. Sometimes they don't love it and they leave it and talk about following Christ outside the Church.

Francis and the early Franciscan family faced the same problem: an in-

ALA backs summer study of 1970 job safety law

A broad summer study program sponsored by the Alliance for Labor Action is expected to result in more effective implementation of the 1970 Federal Occupational Health and Safety Act.

Eight ALA student interns, four in Washington, D.C., two in Boston, and one each in St. Louis and Charleston, West Va., have been hired to probe a variety of health and safety problems of direct concern to American workers.

Announcement of the program, Project Workplace Survival was made by ALA Co-Chairmen Leonard Woodcock and Frank Fitzsimmons. They said that ALA was deeply concerned by some early indications that the 1970 law "won't or can't be effectively enforced by the Government."

"We think this project can help provide some important information to our unions and will enable us to strive more intelligently to assure proper implementation of the nation's first health and safety bill of rights for workers."

One of the aims of the project is to produce a pocket-sized manual for in-plant use by unionists charged with the responsibility of making certain their company is living up to the law. The pamphlet will describe workers' rights and provide a clear, concise series of steps to follow to make sure that any violations reach the proper authorities.

The Washington interns are also working on a catalogue of available monitoring equipment for workers. "The idea is to let workers know they can conduct their own surveillance and provide important information to Federal inspectors looking into formal complaints," said Ron Sinoway, the 26-year-old Georgetown Law School senior in charge of the Washington phase of the project.

The catalogue is expected to be ready in September, said Sinoway.

In St. Louis, an intern will work with Teamster Local 688 to measure the "relative importance workers give to health and safety." Sinoway says a control group will be tested at the beginning and the end of the summer to gauge safety concerns. At the same time an industrial hygienist will conduct studies designed to find out the extent of hazards in the workplace.

It is hoped, said Sinoway, that one of the results of the St. Louis experiment is the development of a relationship between Washington University of St. Louis and the local unions, who "may find the need to call on the university's technical experts for future health and safety programs."

In Boston, two Harvard Medical School student interns will help Dr. David Wegman continue his studies of the effects of heat and noise pollution and what can be done to bring the issues to the bargaining table.

Interns in Boston will also be working to find out more about workers attitudes toward the problems of health and safety and try to provide some clues to how to broaden workers' concern for their on-the-job safety.

the education of an Organizer: Atlanta Style

Twenty ALA Atlanta organizers went to school June 12 and 13 to study some basic and advanced concepts of trade union organizing from veteran labor educator-organizers, Frank Lyons and George Daitsman of the Teamster Labor Institute. Tony Zivalich, appointed in April to direct the ALA Atlanta effort, arranged the session "to add to on-the-job experiences," of the organizers, most of whom moved to their current jobs without any formalized training. The school attempted to lay bare the tough realities of the job and was highlighted by an observation by Lyons who said "his gut instinct" was that the ALA Atlanta program offered great hope that the long-time dream for massive organizing in the South now had a "real chance to succeed."

VIETNAM...

A Way Out

UAW President Leonard Woodcock delivered the keynote address to the annual convention of the Americans for Democratic Action. Reprinted below are excerpts from that speech.

Now I would like to say something more extensively about the war. I have been saying in many speeches, "We've got to get out." And I firmly believe that. But just saying that really isn't sufficient because it leaves behind unsolved problems, problems that we as a nation are largely responsible for bringing into being.

It's clear, of course, that the American consensus, for whatever reason, against the Indochina War has gone far beyond the liberal and campus communities where at one time it began. From coast to coast across Middle America, and in every accent throughout the land, voices are calling on the Administration to end this tragic conflict and to end U.S. involvement. The question no longer is whether, but when the U.S. should withdraw—immediately or by December 31, this year or next.

The cynical expectation is that the President's unstated date is some time near November 1972. The current rate of withdrawal will be around 80,000 troops, perhaps all volunteers, by July of 1972. Unless there is a break in the negotiations which resolves the prisoner of war issue, these troops and the American prisoners of war in North Vietnam could be made hostages for each other with the withdrawal date contingent upon prisoner release as the North Vietnamese await the outcome of our 1972 elections.

Whatever date you support for getting out of Vietnam—and all of us, of course, would want tomorrow, everyone would agree that now is the time to do everything in our power to get all the killing stopped at the earliest possible moment and advance whatever date is set for American withdrawal.

For it is clear that Nixon's Vietnamization plan will not end the conflict or the killing. Ending direct American combat involvement will simply substitute Vietnamese blood for that of American blood and yellow bodies for white ones. The North and South Vietnamese will continue, perhaps for many years, to tear each other apart and blow each other to bits with the bombs, bullets, planes, tanks and mortars supplied by their respective allies, until one side or the other wins a military victory and imposes its will by force on the people of South Vietnam.

The Paris negotiations are all but dead. Hope has virtually disappeared for a political solution as the parties use the talks for propaganda purposes.

Yet the coming months present a new opportunity—perhaps the last—for the United States to take actions for peace and to pursue a policy that could end all the killing and not just Vietnamize it, to break the deadlock and bring about negotiations for the accommodations that are necessary to reaching a political settlement.

1971 is an election year in South Vietnam, the voters there are to choose a new House of Representatives in August and a president in October. These elections could be a fraud and a farce, or they could be an occasion for moving the conflict from the military to the political arena. What the United States does in the coming months can be decisive in either direction. Now is the time for us to act for peace instead of war.

First the United States, I believe, should initiate immediately and unilaterally a stand-still cease-fire taking defensive positions and stopping all offensive military action, including all air and ground missions, firing only in self defense. We would announce and publicize throughout South Vietnam our intention to take no military action except in self-defense, to establish a peaceful atmosphere for the period of the campaigns and elections inviting and urging the other side to join in the cease fire and the elections. At the same time, we would continue our withdrawals and announce unequivocally our intentions to withdraw all military force as soon as a permanent, effectively supervised cease fire has been agreed upon. We should test the sincerity of the North Vietnamese and not dismiss their offers out of hand as not credible and propaganda. Such a reaction taken by our government in the last two days is that of a government which is dedicated to continuing this war.

UAW to Congress: End the War

The war in Indochina is our country's major problem.

It has caused countless American and Vietnamese deaths, for no apparent good. It has seriously sapped the nation's economic strength. It has undermined our ability to address domestic and international problems, diverted our leadership from the true goals of a democratic society and resulted in mounting bitterness among our citizens.

We must change our national direction. We must begin to meet the urgent problems of our poor, our unemployed, our cities. We must drop our pretentions of militarism, and return the country to a position of moral leadership in world affairs.

To do these things, prompt Vietnam withdrawal is essential. Because the President has failed to initiate a timely withdrawal, it falls to the Congress to take the first step.

In the House, the Nedzi-Whalen amendment to the military procurement bill would withhold funds for the deployment of American troops in Vietnam. In the Senate, the McGovern-Hatfield amendment to the selective service bill would do the same. We urge the respective Houses to approve these amendments, thereby returning the nation to the path of peace and the solution of domestic problems.

—Statement by UAW Executive Board

Simultaneously, we should undertake vigorous pursuit of a permanent, internationally-supervised cease-fire agreement. Some such agreement is essential to ending the fighting and to assure the safe return of U.S. prisoners of war and all U.S. military forces.

On October 7, 1970, President Nixon, with great fanfare, proposed a stand-still cease fire throughout all of Indochina. The proposal was hailed throughout the country and the world by Hawks and Doves alike. For the first time, it appeared that the United States had changed its policy, that negotiations would replace Mr. Kissinger's Vietnamization policy, and that peace might have a chance. I personally publically supported this proposal of the President's. Unfortunately for humanity, the proposal was kept alive for just about four weeks. After November 3rd, 1970—and need I remind you that was election day—it was dropped. It has hardly been mentioned since, much less followed up as a serious proposal would be. And once again, Vietnamization emerged as the only policy the Administration intended to follow.

Was the cease-fire proposal a cruel hoax? A phony election gimmick designed only to help Republican candidates in the last weeks of the campaign? Or does the Nixon Administration simply lack the will, or the imagination, or the energy, or the negotiating skill, or guts, to follow through on their cease fire proposal? When pressed on this question, their excuse is simply that the other side rejected the proposal.

Well, if the UAW had taken "no" for an answer and dropped its proposal the first time General Motors said "no," or if we had failed to analyze the language of the replies we received, or pursued the openings, however bleak and subtle they may have been, or if we had failed to take initiatives, or modified our proposals in response to their's, or if we had failed to mobilize support and interest in our position on the part of the public—we'd still be sitting at the negotiating table in Detroit getting nowhere, just as the negotiators are getting nowhere in Paris.

The months of diplomatic activity that have surrounded the Middle East cease fire proposals suggests that when the Administration is serious it knows how to proceed to enlist the aid of outside parties, to enlist the allies of both sides, exploring every possible opening, influencing its own allies, developing detailed proposals and responses, carrying on a full-scale sustained diplomatic program in its behalf. It would seem not unreasonable to expect that at least some of this kind of energy could be expended on behalf of the October 7th proposal for a cease fire in Vietnam, where American men are dying now, and where American prisoners are now held captive.

The Nixon Administration's concentration in the Paris talks on the release of American prisoners before ending the conflict puts the cart before the horse and in a very cruel sense uses our men as an excuse for not negotiating, perhaps keeping them in captivity much longer than necessary. Negotiation and not Vietnamization is the way to unlock the cells of the American prisoners in North Vietnam.

There are now on the table in Paris cease-fire proposals by both sides, proposals that are admittedly very far apart, but which could be the vehicle for resuming talks if the United States would undertake a sustained program in pursuit of a political rather than a military solution in Vietnam.

ALA joins fight to open suburbs to moderate-income workers

A major challenge to restrictive zoning laws may one day solve one of the more basic problems facing thousands of American workers who are forced to travel long, sweaty and expensive hours to their suburban jobs each day.

The Alliance for Labor Action joined the fight to open up the suburbs to moderate income workers when it agreed to help fund the New Jersey Community Union Housing Corp., Inc. (NJCUHC). Sponsored by the UAW, NJCUHC has been working since 1968 to find and build with Federal help, suitable dwellings for low-moderate income workers and senior citizens.

Paul Giblin, NJCUHC's attorney, says ALA's $36,000 grant is the reason "we may one day soon find a way to enable UAW members at Ford Motor Co., and Teamster members who haul cars from the plant to live in the town of Mahwah, N.J. where the plant is located."

Giblin explained that Mahwah has a minimum one acre requirement for building lots. That means that including the cost of the land a worker would have to be able to afford a $50,000 home to live in Mahwah. "That's not very likely," declares Giblin, who also notes that most of the surrounding areas have similar restrictions.

"What they are really saying," Giblin contends, "is that they want people to work in Mahwah, but after hours they don't won't them to live in the town."

The effects of the zoning bar on workers is very broad, Giblin points out. He says that most of the UAW members at Ford are forced to travel at least two and three hours a day and that the annual cost can go to as high as $1,000.

"And there is the discomfort of having to get up at three or four in the morning to catch a ride to the plant for the earliest shift which begins at 6 a.m.," he points out.

"Many workers would elect to live close in or close to Mahwah if they could afford it," he contends.

But all that may end if the organization can convince Cooper Union of New York to sell or lease about 50 acres of land in Mahwah to the Corporation. Giblin says ALA's funds enabled NJCUHC to hire a full-time person to seek available property to build low cost housing for moderate income working people."

He claims that with the right subdivision the Corporation could make available single family homes for about $20,000 to $25,000 by "subdividing on the basis of one quarter or one-half acre lots."

"That's more like a realistic price for working people," he emphasizes.

Giblin also says Teamster members have shown "substantial interest" in the effort to destroy what he calls an obvious discriminatory barrier based on economic class differences and is a subtle way to keep blacks from living in Mahwah.

"An estimated 40 percent of the 5,000 workers at Ford are black or Puerto Rican," claims Aaron Resnick, president of UAW Local 906 in Mahwah.

Resnick, who has worked at Ford since 1955, says he travels 35 miles one way to work every day. "I can't afford to live here and neither can most of our members," he says angrily.

Resnick claims the union has come in for considerable criticism from "the chamber of commerce types," who "argue against what they call special treatment for workers."

Townspeople argue also that a lifting of the minimum zoning requirement will result in a "tremendous increase in the welfare rolls," says Resnick.

"But that's just a coverup for retaining Mahwah's purge of working people as neighbors," he contends.

In January, the UAW and the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing filed a complaint in Newark, N.J. charging that local zoning laws deprived union members from living near their jobs at Ford's assembly plant in Mahwah.

The complaint, which was filed with the State Division on Civil Rights, received considerable national exposure and represented the first legal challenge by a major American labor union of local land-use restrictions that effectively exclude low-income residents.

The complaint charged that the minimum one acre requirement served to keep most of the 5,000 Ford workers from building homes in Mahwah.

The complaint also claimed Mahwah's opposition to new apartment construction effectively "confined" the community's small black population to a dilapidated neighborhood in the downtown section, or else "was driving it out of town."

Until the Auto Workers decision to complain to the state, attacks on local zoning bars have taken place in the courts. But the courts have been painfully slow to decide an issue which most people consider to be political dynamite, says Attorney Giblin.

"Even the state has been reluctant to move too fast to decide the complaint," he notes and goes on to say that the NJCUHC's recent discovery of the Cooper Union land is important "because maybe we can find another way to get around the zoning laws of Mahwah and other communities."

He contends that success by the Housing Corp., which is under the direction of Martin Gerber, UAW's longtime Region Nine director, "will enable us to argue the illegality of similar zoning restrictions in other places."

Giblin claims that the worker is unfairly shut out of towns like Mahwah, Saddle River and Franklin Lakes "where residents enjoy fine schools, lush green, quiet streets and adequate housing."

"But it's the taxes on workers' wages which pay the bill for the excellent schools, smooth country roads and to construct the sewers," explains Giblin. "It's the taxes on wages which enable Mahwah to charge its residents one of the lowest property tax rates in Bergen County," he continues.

"It's just not fair," Giblin concludes. "We think that with the help of ALA we will do something about it."

Richard Nixon, Rosemary's baby and the new young voter

"Is Richard Nixon Rosemary's baby?"

"Today's pig is tomorrow's baloney sandwich."

"Do it. Do it. Register and vote."

A strange mixture of cynicism and hope is spreading a gloomy confusion among America's political pundits.

They can't seem to figure out a neat little package for what they all agree may well be the deciding factor in the 1972 national elections: the millions of new young voters enfranchised by Congress' decision to lower the minimum voting age to 18 in Presidential contests.

"They can go either way," says Carl Wagner of ALA's Washington staff. He has been coordinating the Alliance's effort to register youngsters in California, Wisconsin, New Mexico and Massachusetts, all key primary states in the '72 battle.

Wagner points to the poster contests run by ALA in several California high schools. "Raising the President's relationship to Rosemary is a funny, sarcastic way of showing deep distrust of this president and what he stands for," says Wagner.

But it doesn't mean a total disrespect for the potential of the political system to solve many of the country's most critical problems, Wagner is quick to note.

ALA's youthful vote coordinator says there is no sure way to tell how the new voters will swing in 1972.

"It depends on the candidates and their approach to the issues of greatest concern to the 18 to 21-year-olds who will vote for the first time.

Wagner believes that candidates for the nation's highest office will have to stress a belief in the right and capability of young people "to make their own decisions."

He also stresses the independence of the new voter, "which is especially evident in states where you don't have to register as a Democrat or Republican to vote in the primaries."

ALA has been conducting a registration campaign mostly among high school students and local coordinators report 90 percent of the eligible students have been registering in California and close to that percentage in Wisconsin, New Mexico and Massachusetts.

In California, Wagner estimates that local deputy registrars have signed up between 50,000 and 75,000 students since the drive began in April.

The potential in California and elsewhere hasn't been really tapped, he says. In California it has been estimated 1,800,000 18 to 21-year-olds will be eligible to vote for the first time in 1972. "When you consider that Bobby Kennedy won his 1968 California primary by about 130,000 votes you can see how decisive the new young voter could be," Wagner speculates.

Some professional politicians discount the importance of the new voters, saying they won't vote in any greater numbers than their parents.

But early indications are that traditional pattern may be reversed. There are signs that young people are registering in sizable numbers.

Newsweek magazine reported recently that at Arizona University in Tempe, the League of Women Voters helped register 4,500 of some 6,000 eligible students. In Pennsylvania a major effort "put 183,000 new young voters on the rolls."

Add those examples to ALA's impressive performance in California and elsewhere and you begin to be able to make a case for new young voters to reverse the past record of lower record of registering and voting than other segments of society, Wagner argues.

The ALA staffer also points to a recent special Congressional election in Maryland where new young voters turned out in "significantly greater" numbers than their parents.

ALA's California effort has concentrated on the children of working people because, says Wagner, "most of them won't go on to college and this could be the last time to register them."

He explains that the idea was to register the children of working class people at the most convenient point—the high school. "Experience says it's much harder and more expensive to register people outside of some kind of institutionalized format like the high school," Wagner declared.

Trade unions have a special interest in the registration of the new voters. "History demonstrates clearly that the better educated and more affluent, many of whom find a home in the Republican Party act in a way counter to the best interests of the labor movement," Wagner explains.

The labor movement constantly seeks alliances among the more progressive segments of the nation, and the new young voter is potentially a vital ally, many trade union leaders have said in recent months as evidenced by other young voter registration projects.

Critical to the California effort was a legal decision permitting immediate registration of 17-year-olds who will be 18 and eligible to vote in 1972. "That's one of the reasons we chose California," Wagner says and he points out that similar rulings in Wisconsin, New Mexico and Massachusetts provided the stimulus for important ALA campaigns in those states.

Wagner thinks the key to success has been "our ability to interest political leaders at the local level and to attract committed local people to be deputy registrars to follow through in the schools." He strongly underscores the difficulty of outside direction and says "you can't run a successful program from a distance."

He points out that labor leaders applied the "clout" needed to convince local politicians to rule favorably on the eligibility of 17-year-olds to register now.

Without that kind of practical pressure "we couldn't have been as successful as we were," he explains.

But he cautions there is still "a long way to go." "There are some 25 million potential new voters in the nation, enough to make a big difference in 1972 and for many years into the future, but it is going to take a massive effort to enroll them not only as voters but to take an active role in the political process," Wagner says.

"ALA's preliminary work suggests the labor movement is ideally suited for the job," Wagner contends.

"But it is going to take a major commitment to build an effective, workable alliance," he concludes.

Vietnam: A Way Out

Simultaneously with the cease-fire initiatives, we must bring pressure to bear for political initiatives in South Vietnam. The other side must be invited to participate fully with adequate safeguards in every aspect of the coming elections, not only in voting and running candidates but in coalition, caretaker arrangements which would include all parties and could take the elections effectively out of the unrestricted jurisdiction of, say, the Thieu-Ky government.

Such an offer could meet some of the objections raised by the other side to elections with Thieu and Ky in charge, or perhaps open the way to negotiation of some kind of acceptable arrangements which could take the parties a long way toward the accommodations necessary to a political settlement.

If the other side is ever to give up violence, they must have full and fair access to the political process and guarantees against reprisals for political activities. Even if the other side does not participate openly, the elections could still provide the occasion for broadening the government, bringing in neutralist elements, and paving the way for tacit political accommodations. A de facto cease fire could increase the chances for success. In any event, the American government must refrain from any activity or aid on behalf of any candidates or which would compromise the freedom and integrity of these elections. At the same time, we must bring every pressure to bear on the Thieu government to make provisions for fair and honest elections. We should prohibit the use of any of our military or other resources on behalf of any candidates. We should demand the release of all those in prison for political activity and insist upon freedom of speech, assembly, and press for all citizens, fair access to the mass media, and freedom to travel by all candidates, and guarantees against reprisals for political activity.

To help assure that these elections are fair and open and to deter raiding and cheating by any parties, an international citizens' observer team should be formed in consultation and cooperation with the various Vietnamese parties and groups to work on the scene in South Vietnam for the campaign and election period to observe, evaluate, and report on the honesty of the electoral process. Such a team could enlist moral and political leaders, humanitarians and parliamentarians from countries around the world to join with the Vietnamese people to help assure honest elections. The objectivity and integrity of such a commission must be above question, with its only partisanship on behalf of peace and the opportunity for all the South Vietnamese people to choose freely, without coersion, their own leaders of government.

And finally, to help bind the sickening wounds of this war, we must pledge at least a billion dollars in aid and reconstruction to both South and North Vietnam.

health security movie set

Bet you're scratching your head trying to figure out why we are running this photo of a fat little imp savoring the last few drops of her "slurpie." Relax, it's just our corny way of drawing your attention to a new movie about the fight to win better health care for all Americans.

The movie, entitled "A Nation's Promise," produced by the Health Security Action Council of Washington, D.C. in cooperation with the Alliance for Labor Action, portrays many of the major problems faced by consumers of health care and offers practical solutions to skyrocketing costs, inefficient use of people and equipment and deteriorating health care.

ALA partners team up in Wisconsin; Small Virginia community to benefit

NEXT STOP, NEW CANTON. UAW and Teamster local union leaders in Beloit, Wisconsin were instrumental in supplying a small community in southern Virginia with much needed X-ray machinery. Organized by UAW's STEP program in cooperation with Project Concern, the unionists raised money and supplied van and driver to haul an X-ray, fluoroscope machine to the Central Virginia Community Health Center. From the left, Werner Wathke, president, Teamster Local 579; Robert McNatt, chairman, Janesville, Madison area CAP Council; Allied Van Lines driver and Wallace Friedman, secretary-treasurer, Teamster Local 579.

A tiny, impoverished Virginia community is the beneficiary of the concern and cooperation demonstrated by Teamster and UAW local unions in Wisconsin.

New Canton, Virginia won't stir bright lighters used to considerable after-dark urban action. The town is a speck in the southern corner of rural Virginia, often overlooked by myopic mapmakers bent on easing the plight of auto jockeys on their way to someplace else.

Unions don't get very excited about the possibilities of New Canton. You won't find the area rated at or near the top of any organizer's list of target sites.

The area suffers from a kind of understated misery relieved only by occasional whimpers of recognition.

Wisconsin local unions affiliated with the Teamsters and Auto Workers recently learned about New Canton, Virginia. And in small way they showed the potential implicit in the ALA's ability to be the spark for solution to troublesome problems facing small segments of American society.

Health care is one important problem facing residents of areas like New Canton. Equipment and personnel often are not readily available. It takes a special breed of doctor to give up the great material rewards of medical practice. Places like New Canton can't match the green potential of large urban areas like New York, Chicago and Los Angeles.

Even if you find a committed physician he has to labor under less-than-perfect conditions. Facilities often are inadequate; trained para-professionals are rare and equipment is in short supply. It takes extraordinary person to cope.

New Canton is luckier than most places. Residents of the town and area can call on a community health center staffed by several bright-eyed professionals eager to provide health services to the community.

All they need is a little help now and then. They got it recently from the labor movement in Wisconsin.

The Auto Workers boast of something they call STEP (Social-Technical-Education Program) run by the union's International Affairs Department in Washington, D.C. STEP was the coordinating vehicle by which New Canton's health center has acquired an X-ray-Fluoroscope machine provided by a Beloit, Wisconsin doctor.

Dr. Thomas Zurkowski of Beloit had the machine and he wanted to donate it to New Canton. So he got in touch with a local affiliate of Project Concern, a national organization devoted to alleviating needy communities' medical problems.

Mrs. Gloria Geise, chairman of Wisconsin Jaycette's Project Concern, and Dr. Zurkowski, agreed they needed to find a way to get the machine to New Canton.

And that's where the STEP came in. STEP's Stan Greenspan contacted UAW's Janesville-Madison Community Action Program Council (Locals 95, 443 and 1329) and Teamsters Local 579 and together those unions raised money and arranged to ship the equipment to the health center.

CAP Council and Teamster representatives said "we are proud to assist in this worthy cause." It's the kind of joint effort envisioned by Alliance for Labor Action leaders who believe the labor movement has an important role to play in helping the less fortunate.

Employment problems of the middle-aged, older and black Americans will receive extensive attention in two conferences in Washington, D.C. cosponsored by the Alliance for Labor Action in June.

About 300 persons attended a June 14 meeting designed by the National Afro-American Labor Council to discuss unemployment with special emphasis on the effects on black workers.

On June 30 and July 31, 200 delegates will probe the problems of the middle-aged and older workers at a conference put on by the National Council On the Aging.

Leonard Woodcock and Frank Fitzsimmons, ALA Co-Chairmen, have announced an interim emergency grant of $4,000 to help ease the plight of a group of impoverished Indians in the Far West.

The funds go to Southern California Indian Assistance, Inc. (SCIA) of San Diego and will enable the organization to continue a three-year campaign to alleviate the suffering of Cocopah Indian poor in near Yuma, Arizona; the Hopi of New Mexico and the Navajo in Arizona, said Woodcock and Fitzsimmons.

SCIA is directed by Teamster (Local 36, San Diego) Edgar J. Thomas, Jr., who founded the organization in 1968. Thomas says SCIA has distributed over 500,000 pounds of food, clothing and medical supplies with an estimated value of $380,000 to the Indians or to medical missionaries.

The Teamsters Executive Board tapped Frank Fitzsimmons to replace James R. Hoffa as president following the latter's official resignation from the union's top post. Fitzsimmons, who has been running the union since 1967, is expected to win election to a full-five year term when the union's convention opens in Miami Beach, Fla., on July 5.

Hoffa revealed his decision first on June 3 saying in a letter to the Board that he would not be a candidate for re-election. He said that he supported Fitzsimmons for the presidency and urged the convention to elect his longtime friend and associate to succeed him.

The Teamsters Executive Board has unanimously endorsed Fitzsimmons.

To limit military expenditures and help the effort to redirect federal spending in America, the Coalition on National Priorities and Military Policy has begun a major grassroots campaign to rally "citizens support" of the Proxmire amendment to the Department of Defense Procurement Authorization Bill (S. 939).

The coalition, which recently received a $5,000 grant from the ALA, says a recent Gallup Poll indicates that more than 50% of the nation believes America should "reduce spending for national defense and military purposes." They argue forcefully that the Defense Department ignores the recent intent of Congress, spends more than Congress authorizes and that S. 939 eventually will put an end to the violations by establishing the principle "of a spending ceiling as an annual concern."

The International Chemical Workers Union of Akron, Ohio, an ALA affiliate since 1969, decided to rejoin the AFL-CIO in May. The decision was announced by the Union's President Thomas E. Boyle.

Co-Chairmen Frank Fitzsimmons and Leonard Woodcock pointed out that membership in the ALA is "voluntary." "We wish the Chemical Workers well," they declared.

It's going to cost the American Medical Association a bundle to battle national health security. Those paragons of conservative virtue recently announced a $1.5 million kitty to flood the country with anti-health security propaganda.

Liberals may be hard pressed to counter AMA's pitch which some say has $750,000 allocated for advertising alone. AMA's plan, "Medicredit," provides tax credits for purchase of health insurance and doesn't do much about reorganizing the system.

BIOGRAPHICAL DATA FOR
WILEY A. BRANTON

Wiley A. Branton, Executive Director of the Community and Social Action Division of the Alliance for Labor Action since July 1969, was born in Pine Bluff, Arkansas on December 13, 1923. He received a Bachelor of Science degree in Business Administration from Arkansas A. M. & N. College and a Juris Doctorate from the University of Arkansas.

The Alliance for Labor Action (ALA) was formed by the United Auto Workers and the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, America's two largest labor organizations, and is committed to a program to revitalize the American labor movement and to help America find answers to its urgent social problems. The ALA maintains offices in Washington, D. C. Mr. Branton came to ALA from the United Planning Organization where he directed the Metropolitan Washington community action agency.

A lawyer by profession, Mr. Branton was engaged in the general practice of law in Arkansas from 1952 until 1962. During that time he achieved national prominence as Chief Counsel for the Negro plaintiffs in the Little Rock school case. He is a member of the bars of Arkansas, Georgia, the District of Columbia and the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. Branton served as Special Assistant to former Attorneys General Nicholas Katzenbach and Ramsey Clark at the Department of Justice from 1965 until 1967 where he assisted in the implementation of the Voting Rights Act.

Prior to this he served as Executive Secretary of the President's Council on Equal Opportunity, established by Executive Order of President Lyndon Johnson on February 5, 1965. The Council, chaired by Vice President Hubert Humphrey, was composed of most of the Cabinet members and heads of major Federal agencies. The Council was abolished in October of 1965.

In 1962, Mr. Branton was appointed Director of the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta, Georgia. The Voter Education Project was a cooperative effort involving the major civil rights organizations and many local groups which led to the registration of over 600,000 Negro voters in eleven southern states between 1962 and 1965.

He has also served as Executive Director of the Council for United Civil Rights Leadership in New York City and of the Committee for Welfare, Education and Legal Defense, Inc. He has received numerous citations and awards for his civil rights activities.

Mr. Branton is a veteran of World War II, a Baptist, Mason and member of Omega Psi Phi fraternity. He is married to the former Lucille McKee of Memphis, Tennessee and they have six children.

THE JULIAN BOND CASE

The Facts

Five days before the opening of the Georgia House, John Lewis, Chairman of SNCC issued a statement condemning U. S. "Aggression" in Viet Nam and claiming that America was responsible for the "murder" of Vietnamese peasants. He called upon Americans to refuse to participate in the war by any means.

Reporters, knowing that Julian Bond, as well as being a newly elected legislator, was also Public Relations Director of SNCC, sought him out to question him. Mr. Bond stated that he concurred "fully" with the statement. Asked about whether he advocated draft-card burning, Mr. Bond stated that he did not advocate this, that he had his own draft card which he had no intention of burning, but that he did "admire" the courage" of those who protested the war knowing they must face the legal consequences and community ostracism.

Some Georgia House members responded by signing a petition to deny Mr. Bond his seat because his statements "gave aid and comfort to the enemy." Mr. Bond was informed that this petition would be considered by the Georgia House on its opening day, Monday, January 10th.

On the eve of the opening House session, the Georgia ACLU issued a statement through its president, Hugh W. Gibert, which said in part:

"Disagreement over U. S. policies cannot be made the basis for ousting a duly elected public official from office. If it were, we would have precious few legislators, since many of them shouted defiance of the constitutional decisions of the U. S. Supreme Court only a few years ago.

"Individual members of the ACLU, myself included, consider that to characterize our policy in Viet Nam as "Aggression" and to say that the United States bears part of the responsibility for 'murder' of peasants' is reckless and unfair. These are not relevant considerations, however, since what is at stake is freedom of speech guaranteed by the First Amendment of the U. S. Constitution.

"To dissent from American policy is not to be disloyal. We are too great a country, and our freedom is too real and meaningful for us to think it necessary to pretend to the world that we are unanimous on any issue, either foreign or domestic..."

On Monday morning, at the opening session, Mr. Bond was not permitted by Speaker George T. Smith to take the oath of office given to other House members. At 11:30 a.m., Mr. Smith announced that the petition to oust Mr. Bond would be considered by a special twenty-eight member legislative committee with himself as chairman. The committee was to convene that same afternoon at 2:30 p.m. to consider the case in the House Chamber. The hearing was open to all House members, the press and the gallery.

The Hearing

The hearing began -- unpromptly at 3:30 p.m. -- before a packed house. Mr. Bond was represented by ACLU of Georgia Vice-President Howard Moore, Jr., assisted by ACLU Southern Regional Director Charles Morgan, Jr. The signers of the House petition brought Mr. Denmark Groover of Macon, a former House floor leader during the Griffin Administration, to present their case. Mr. Bond's attorneys called his two election rivals - one Republican and one Democrat - to testify that they felt he should take his seat, and that he would undoubtedly carry the 136th District again. This testimony was followed by statements from Senator LeRoy Johnson and Senator Horace Ward who also urged his seating. The chief witness for the petitioners was a Mr. Ed Spivey, a reporter for the state-owned radio station WGST, who produced a tape of an interview with Mr. Bond. The introduction of this tape by the petitioners was rather curious, since in it, Mr. Bond re-iterated several times that he did not advocate draft-card burning and would not burn his.

On cross examination of Mr. Spivey, Mr. Moore elicited the information that Mr. Spivey had no personal knowledge that Mr. Bond had been told that his telephone interview was being taped, and that there was no beeper on the telephone to apprise him that the telephone conversation was being recorded.

Mr. Morgan made the closing statement for Mr. Bond, stressing both the free speech aspects of the case, and pointing out the dangerous precedent which would be set for other state legislatures by the Georgia House action. Mr. Groover concluded for the petitioners by labelling Mr. Bond's statements as "treason" and by calling upon the House to refuse to seat him in the name of patriotism.

The special committee voted 26-3 against seating Mr. Bond, and an overwhelming 184 members of the House voted to follow their recommendation. Only twelve members dissented.

THE JULIAN BOND CASE, CON'T.

The Case

Following the House action, Mr. Bond's attorneys filed suit to enjoin the House from refusing to seat Mr. Bond. Or, as an alternative, the suit calls for the adjournment of the House until the 136th District can be represented. A three-Judge federal court has been impaneled to hear the case. (A three-Judge court is required by law whenever the constitutionality of statutes are brought into question.) The plaintiffs in the suit are Julian Bond, and two of the residents of the 136th District which he represents, one of them being Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

The suit is based chiefly on the following grounds:

1. Mr. Bond was denied the right of free speech as guaranteed in the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

2. His constituents have been denied their right of representation as guaranteed by the Fourteen and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution.

3. The House action amounts to a bill of attainder and ex post facto law -- i.e., a special act seeking purnishment for a particular named person, passed by a legislature against a named person subjecting him to a pain or penalty for something he did while not a member of the legislature.

4. Mr. Bond, was in fact, tried for treason and for violating the Selective Service Act. He was therefore, the suit contends, deprived of his right to be indicted by a Grand Jury under the Fifth Amendment, and to his right to a trial by jury under the Six and Fourteenth Amendment.

5. The statutes and provisions of the rules of the Georgia House of Representatives under which Mr. Bond was tried are vague. The ACLU contends that they are thus void for such vagueness under the First and Fourteenth Amendments of the Constitution.

This case is scheduled to be heard on January 28th. In the meantime, Governor Sanders has called a special election in the 136th District for February 23rd, five days after the Legislature adjourns.

The Advertisement

Seven hundred-fifty Georgians signed the advertisement to appear in the Atlanta Constitution on Wednesday, January 26th. With their signed ads they sent in dollar bills to pay for it. To meet the deadline, only Atlanta area ACLU members were contacted of whom almost 60% responded with a signature and a dollar, or more. But in spite of the limited circulation of the ad, signatures came also from Rome, Macon, Columbus, Savannah, Athens and Augusta.

THE JULIAN BOND CASE, CON'T

Over a third of the signers were students and faculty members. Among the rest were ministers, businessmen, lawyers, elementary and high school teachers, doctors, and of course, hundreds of citizens whose occupations could not be identified by their name or addresses.

To ACLU members and others who responded so promptly and generously -- many, many thanks.

ACLU TO SHOW POINT OF ORDER FEBRUARY 25

Circle this date on your calendar: - Friday, February 25th at 8:00 p.m. at Lenox Square Auditorium - an extra-special ACLU meeting, featuring the film Point of Order. This is a commercially made movie about the McCarthy erea, including the dramatic confrontation between Senator McCarthy and Attorney Joseph P. Welch.

We were apprehensive when we thought of scheduling the film that it might seem like ancient history. But in view of the Bond case, and the proposal to create a Georgia Un-American Activities Committee, it is, alas, all too timely. You won't want to miss this gripping movie!

YOUR RENEWAL NOTICES ARE COMING!

We picture all our ACLU members as anxiously questioning the postman each day: "Where is my ACLU renewal notice? I am so impatient to pay my dues that I can hardly wait."

This is to reassure all ACLU members -- except those who joined or renewed in the last two months of 1965 -- that they are on their way. We know you will all be relieved to get this information.

BILL OF RIGHTS DAY POLL

For the second year, 1,000 college students participated in a poll testing their attitudes towards the Bill of Rights. The students were from the University of Georgia, Georgia State, Oglethorpe, Emory, Clark and Georgia Southern colleges. The questions in this year's test were exactly the same as last year's, so that we could make a comparison between the two.

Surprisingly, especially in view of the talk of "white backlash" and Georgia's gubernatorial picture, this year's students were markedly less authoritarian in many respects:

o The percentage of students who felt the police could question a suspect without letting him call a lawyer dropped 17%.

o 79% of this year's students felt that segregated education violated the Constitution; last year only 66% felt that it did.

o 73% of this year' students felt that teachers should not be required to take a loyalty oath; last year only 42% felt this way.

o Out of fifteen questions on the poll, only three indicated a swing to more authoritarian positions, most notably on the question of prayer in public schools.

The complete results of the poll show this year's percentages compared with last, followed by the applicable section of the Constitution, and where available, a recent Supreme Court decision. If you would like a copy, please write or call the ACLU of Georgia office (404/523-5398) and we'll be glad to mail one to you as long as the supply lasts.

KNOW YOUR RIGHTS PROGRAM GOES NATIONAL

As part of its activity on behalf of Know Your Rights, the Georgia ACLU asked Atlanta Police Chief Jenkins whether he would be interested in supplying every Atlanta police officer with a copy.

Chief Jenkins responded by ordering 1,000 copies and issuing the following bulletin to the Atlanta Police Department:

"The ACLU of Georgia and the Georgia Council on Human Relations have published a booklet entitled Know Your Rights. This publication not only emphasizes the rights and responsibilities of the American citizen, but also the rights and responsibilities of the police...It is a very fine publication and every Atlanta police officer must read it and understand it. Members of this Department are instructed to pick up their copies in the Training Division."

Shortly thereafter, the Georgia Council on Human Relations, which is cooperating in this project, circularized every police chief in Georgia, and in response to their requests, distributed copies to police officers in Augusta, Alma, Tifton, Gainesville and Sumter County.

This police distribution was printed as a story in the Atlanta Constitution, and subsequently in the New York Times and on national television. As a result, we are distributing an average, with the Georgia Council, of 700 copies a week to police departments and citizens' rights groups all over the country.

ACLU TESTIFIES FOR FULTON COUNTY PUBLIC DEFENDER

Alan Bonser, a member of the ACLU Legislative Committee, testified in favor of the establishment of a Fulton County Public Defender before the public hearing called by the Fulton County Legislative Delegation on January 6th.

In his statement, Mr. Bonser pointed out that recent federal court decisions such as Gideon v. Wainwright have made Georgia's old procedures unacceptable. Under the present system, attorneys for indigent defendants are appointed by the courts and serve without compensation except in capital cases, where they are paid $150. This system imposes an unfair burden on the criminal bar. Also, it frequently means that the court-appointed attorney is either inexperienced or not as committed to providing first-rate legal counsel as he might be for a paying client.

Opposing a public defender system was Fulton Solicitor General Lewis Slaton, who stated that the cost of such a system would be prohibitive — about eight million dollars. Mr. Bonser countered that the cost of the Los Angeles Public Defender System, with more than six million residents (almost two million more than in the whole state of Georgia) was six million dollars. Mr. Slaton, along with Judge Dan Duke, favored a system of assigned counsel modestly compensated by the State, a method currently used in North Carolina.

Mr. Paul Webb pointed out that the danger of the assigned counsel system appointed by the Judge is that the attorney so appointed might be tempted not to challenge the court in any way in order to insure future assignments.

The ACLU proposal is a combination of both the public defender and the assigned counsel. One of the objections often raised to the establishment of a Public Defender is that there will be conscious or unconscious collusion between the prosecutor and the public defender growing out of their close working relationship. While experience from other areas using public defenders has shown that the true adversary nature of the proceedings has been maintained, it is necessary for a defendant to have confidence in his attorney.

For this reason, the ACLU of Georgia recommended that in addition to the primary public defender structure, indigent defendants who do not wish to make use of the defender could be appointed an attorney from a list to be kept by the court and appointed in order of appearance on the list. These attorneys would be compensated according to the current fee scale accorded to attorneys in private practice.

The ACLU proposal will be presented on a statewide basis to the General Assembly some time during the present session.

BILL OF RIGHTS DAY DINNER

Two hundred twenty-eight ACLU members and friends turned out for the ACLU's Bill of Rights Day Dinner on December 14th. They heard Jack Greenberg, Director-Counsel of the Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., talk about how progress in civil rights had pioneered new concepts in dealing with the problems of the total population — poverty, slums, housing and education. Mr. Greenberg's remarks were thought-provoking throughout, and had special meaning for Georgians when he discussed the problems which communities like Atlanta still face.

Also on the program was the presentation of the Bill of Rights Day Award to Atlanta Mayor Ivan Allen, Jr. The citation on the plaque awarded to him read:

"Because he respects the rights of each of us,
He has made Atlanta a better place for all of us."

In making the award, Georgia ACLU President Hugh Gibert applauded Mayor Allen's contributions to better human relations, in particular his testimony in behalf of the Civil Rights Act. He added that the ACLU had sometimes criticized Mayor Allen's administration in the past, and would feel free to do so in the future, and said that this was a healthy state of affairs. Mayor Allen accepted the award in the same spirit of mutual appreciation and mutual freedom of dissent.

Special thanks for the success of the Bill of Rights Day Dinner — which we plan to make an annual affair — go to Kieve Landesberg, who handled the physical arrangements, and to Faye Goldberg and E. T. Kehrer, who did so much to insure the impressive turnout.

INCREASED ACLU EFFORT NEEDED UNDER MADDOX RULE

In a letter addressed to prospective members last week, the ACLU of Georgia said:

"There's no point in kidding ourselves. We got beaten. The Supreme Court ruled against us in our suit to insure every Georgian of the right to vote and have it counted.

"Now, what? We are faced with four years of government by a man who has shown over and over again his disrespect for the law and his disregard for individual dignity and human rights.

"Some people think now is a smart time to walk softly or to sit tight. We disagree. Now, more than ever before, Georgia needs an alert organization to safeguard the gains made in the past and to insure our freedoms in the future..."

We think we are at least alert enough not to join the rather hysterical chorus of newspaper columnists and editorial writers who profess to see in Mr. Maddox's inaugural address a living incarnation of Georgia's motto of Wisdom, Justice and Moderation. Talk is cheap. The verdict of history will rest on the actions of the new administration over the next four years.

While we are awaiting that verdict, there are several things that each of us as ACLU members can do to insure the freedom of expression, the equal protection of the law and the due process which are our goals:

o Press for election reforms which will discipline voting officials who do not count votes honestly and to make sure that never again will voters lose the right to elect their governor directly.

o Keep working -- hopefully with newly independent legislators -- for needed bills such as public defender, the right to privacy, abolition of the death penalty, protection of the rights of welfare recipients, reform of juvenile procedures. Watch for announcements of public hearings on these subject so that you can voice your opinions.

o Let the Governor and your legislator know that equal protection of the law applies to the state government, in fair employment opportunities, in state police practices, and in education, both for pupils and faculties.

Build the Georgia ACLU so that we can speak with a loud, clear unified voice. Our Georgia membership increased 180% last year alone. This is explosive growth which needs to be continued for us to be effective in protecting Constitutional freedoms. Talk to your friends and colleagues about joining.

Note: Members who missed our showing of Point of Order can see it now on January 17th at Oglethorpe College in the Lupton Hall Auditorium. The film starts at 8 p.m. and there is no admission charge.

FAIR TRIAL VS. FREE PRESS LUNCH ON MARCH 2

The ACLU of Georgia has scheduled a membership luncheon on the subject of Fair Trial vs. Free Press for Thursday, March 2nd at the Progressive Club.

This issue — the conflict between the First Amendment's guarantee of a free press and the Sixth Amendment's promise of a fair trial -- has long been the subject of debate among judges, prosecutors and newsmen. The Supreme Court reversal of the conviction of Dr. Sam Sheppard and the Ruby trial have focussed national attention on the question of how far the press may go in covering a trial, and how far the courts may go in restricting the activities of the press to insure due process.

Interest in the subject heightened when the American Bar Association released a report recommending that judges be permitted to cite the press for contempt for publishing anything that goes beyond the public record during the period of jury selection and trial.

The participants in the discussion at the ACLU luncheon will reflect the conflicting approaches to assuring fair play to both the defendant and the press. The panel members will be:

The Hon. Albert J. Henderson, Jr., Judge of the Superior Court in Cobb County

Albert M. Horn, attorney

William R. Shipp, reporter for the Atlanta Constitution

The program moderator will be Bruce Galphin of the Constitution editorial staff.

It is interesting to note that Judge Henderson has on occasion barred newspapermen from the courtroom and from interviewing prosecution witnesses as a method of insuring fair play for a defendant, a policy which has not met with the approval of local reporters who regard it as a violation of freedom of the press.

Luncheon will be at 12 Noon and the cost is $3. The Progressive Club is located on Techwood Drive off 10th Street, one block west of the 10th Street Expressway exit. Even though we are delighted to see our members under any circumstances, it makes it extremely difficult when they appear at the door without a previous reservation, since we must tell the Progressive Club in advance how many will be there. So please, fill out the coupon on the last page and send it to us promptly.

Both the subject and the caliber of the participants insure a fascinating program. We look forward to seeing you there.

ACLU ANALYZES PROPOSED NEW CRIMINAL CODE

The ACLU of Georgia has sent to members of the House Legislative Committee an analysis of the proposed new Criminal Code introduced by Chairman Robin Harris of DeKalb County. In addition, ACLU President Hugh Gibert testified before the Committee on ACLU positions on code sections.

The ACLU memorandum examined twenty sections which in its judgment should be revised or rejected. Among them are:

o Raising the minimum age for commission of a crime. It seems to us that thirteen years old is too young.

o Insanity. The test of whether or not the defendant can distinguish right from wrong is obsolete and ignores accepted medical evidence that severe mental illness can exist side by side with the ability to tell right from wrong.

o Sex Laws. The sections which make criminal the private acts between consenting adults -- among them married couples enjoying a normal sexual relationship -- are an invasion of privacy.

o Advocacy of Overthrow of Government, Treason and Related Offenses. These sections, which do not link advocacy to the concept of "clear and present danger" violate the First Amendment protection of free speech.

o Electronic Eavesdropping. This section is limited to wiretapping by private individuals and does not deal with it by law enforcement officials, a greater danger to privacy and the Fourth Amendment prohibitions against illegal search.

o Sunday Laws. These sections are religious in origin and intent and therefore constitute an improper establishment of religion barred by the First Amendment. The state may restrict work to a six-day week, but the designation of Sunday in particular restricts the right of the individual to choose his own form of rest and worship.

Legislative Manual Ready

Much of this material, plus several other subjects -- Reform of Juvenile Offender Procedures, Abolition of the Death Penalty, Public Defender, Rights of Welfare Recipients -- is contained in the ACLU Legislative Manual which will be sent to every ACLU member within the next week.

We hope you will find the Manual useful as background material when you talk to your legislator about bills you want passed and when you testify at legislative hearings in your community. We will be glad to send you extra copies to give to your legislator and to community leaders concerned with legislation.

SUPREME COURT REVERSES WHITUS-DAVIS MURDER CONVICTION

As readers of this Newsletter know, the ACLU of Georgia, in cooperation with the Southern Regional ACLU office, has been battling for many years to get the murder convictions of Phil Whitus and Leon Davis reversed on the ground of systematic exclusion of Negroes from the jury which tried them.

After Whitus and Davis had been convicted the first time, the U. S. Court of Appeals ordered a second trial on the ground that the jury had indeed excluded Negroes. A second-all-white jury found them guilty again. Now the ACLU appealed to the U. S. Supreme Court on grounds of jury exclusion in the second trial, pointing out that the jurors were selected from segregated tax digest lists.

On January 27th, 1967, the U. S. Supreme Court ruled that Mr. Whitus and Mr. Davis did not receive a fair trial and ordered the state of Georgia to re-try them before a truly desegregated jury. The unanimous Supreme Court decision makes it clear that where a discriminatory method of jury selection exists, such as a segregated tax digest, the burden of proof will be on the state to show that jury exclusion does not exist.

The ruling is a milestone on the long road to ending segregated justice. For Walter Jones, the attorney who represents Mr. Whitus, it is an especially heartening victory. He has worked for seven years, first as a court-assigned counsel and then as an ACLU cooperating attorney, to secure justice for his client. In recognition of his services, the ACLU of Georgia awarded him its Civil Liberties Citation at last Spring's Annual Meeting.

MACON, ATHENS CHAPTERS ORGANIZE

In the first week of February, both the Macon and Athens ACLU groups met to organize into chapters. They each got started on adopting by-laws, electing officers and creating a committee structure.

Even before this formal organizing process, Athens members held a successful Know Your Rights clinic in the Brooklyn community. Macon members are already concentrating on legal and legislative action to secure a more democratic school board responsible and responsive to the wishes of the community.

We welcome these two new entities into the Georgia ACLU ranks, and hope they may be the forerunners of similar chapters in Savannah, Columbus and Augusta.

RENEWAL TIME IS HERE

Ours is the last organisation in the world to insist on conformity. It delights us to think that members come in all the available sizes, colors, political opinions and life styles. But we honestly don't think it does violence to your highly individualistic convictions to ask you to send in your membership renewal when it is due -- NOW.

Now, in fact, is the time for all good non-conformists to come to the aid of the ACLU. Your renewal notice has come. Please mail it back in the envelope provided with your check.

ADDENDUM TO LESNICK-ROTHWAX-SPARER REPORT ON GOVERNMENT BENEFIT PROGRAMS

This note is designed to make explicit our view that, although we preferred adoption by the National Board of a resolution on income maintenance and government benefit programs that differed in several respects from that adopted by the 1968 Biennial Conference, in the present context we urge adoption of Conference Recommendation No. 28 and those implementing it. The differences between our position and that of the Biennium are not major, and can be worked out over time, once ACLU has made the basic decision to concern itself with minimum standards of economic security; the action of the National Board, if ratified by the national electorate, would close out any meaningful consideration of the problem by the organization. It remains compellingly clear to us that: (1) The widespread economic dependency and deprivation that exist in this country is in significant measure the result of government-sponsored or government-encouraged programs. (2) The pervasive and severe inequalities resulting make any meaningful enjoyment of civil liberties by the affected citizenry a near-total mockery. (3) ACLU cannot remain wholly insensitive to the problem and continue to espouse the cause of civil liberties for all, rather than for that segment of society which already possesses the independence and power to take advantage of the benefits promised by the Bill of Rights. (4) Although not enjoying recognized constitutional protection, the right of each member of our society to live--that is, to enjoy access to an income adequate to insure a minimum standard of health and decency and a realistic prospect that his children can be raised with a fair chance of becoming fully functioning, fully free adults--ought to be considered a civil liberty and not subject to majority whim. It is therefore a proper concern of the American Civil Liberties Union. In our judgment, the step proposed would not transform ACLU into a general-purpose political organization. We see no reason for any disabling fear that ACLU lacks the capacity to work out the problems raised by this much-needed but specific redefinition of its civil liberties concerns.

RE: Proposed ACLU Statement on Government Benefit Programs

This memorandum takes the position that the ACLU interest in welfare and related programs should be focused on civil liberties concerns and that the ACLU should not become mired in those aspects of the subject involving economic and sociological judgments extraneous to free speech, due process, equal protection of the law, the right of privacy and cognate matters. We believe the ACLU should continue to support legislative, litigative and educational efforts (a) to assure due process for welfare applicants or recipients in connection with their right to obtain assistance, or respecting the reduction or termination of such assistance, including the right to a hearing and the availability of counsel, if requested, and (b) to protest against illegal invasions of privacy, for example, by the conducting of midnight raids, and (c) to protest restrictions on the right of poor people to travel freely by unreasonable residence requirements for welfare eligibility or laws permitting the expulsion of poor people from local communities.

We disagree with the conclusions of Biennial Conference Recommendation No. 28 supporting a guaranteed income, because we believe that the ACLU should not become engaged in disputes for or against the economic or social values or the adequacy of proposals for a guaranteed annual income, family maintenance program, children's allowances, negative income tax, or any other income maintenance program. Further, we disagree even more strongly with the views set forth in the report prepared by the other three members of our Committee, Howard Lesnick, Harold Rothwax and Ed Sparer (hereinafter referred to as the "Lesnick Report"), that the ACLU should not only support income maintenance programs, but that "programs of governmental benefits or services - such as education, housing and medical care" (emphasis added) - should become areas of ACLU concern.

In view of the foregoing, we recommend that the Board of Directors:

1. reject Biennial Conference Recommendation No. 28;

2. adopt the statement annexed to this memo; and

3. take no additional action on Biennial Conference Recommendations Nos. 29 to 32, since no further action is required.

These recommendations are not founded on any disagreement by us, as individuals, with the wisdom of either substituting some other system for the present welfare system or of substantially reforming the present welfare system. We deplore the indignities to which the present welfare system subjects many people; and we fully appreciate how questionable as an economic matter the present system may be, and how alternative systems might be devised which could prove more effective. Nor do we, as individuals, disagree with the premise that the U.S. is wealthy enough to assure all of our people with a level of income adequate to meet basic human needs with dignity. However, as concerned members of the ACLU, we think that ACLU involvement in the types of issues proposed by the Biennial Conference and by the Lesnick Report will change the ACLU from the civil liberties organization it is into an all-purpose political group which will help neither the cause of civil liberties nor the ACLU.

Actually, there is nothing in logic which requires the ACLU to be concerned only with civil liberties issues. We could become another Americans for Democratic Action with perhaps some specialization in the civil liberties and civil rights fields. But, that is not the reason we joined the ACLU and we doubt that it is the reason most people joined the ACLU. The special appeal the ACLU has had to us resides in the fact that people from all walks of life, Democrats and Republicans, liberals and conservatives, people with differing views on economic, social and political issues, could all belong to the ACLU so long as their commitment was to the support of the Bill of Rights for all. The ACLU has become an effective organization because it is unique in this respect. Despite the varied views of its individual members, the ACLU, as such, has, for the most part, been non-partisan on the merits of specific economic and social issues. This non-partisan approach has been the ACLU's strength. The non-partisan stance would be abandoned if either Biennial Conference Recommendation No, 28 or the Lesnick Report were adopted.

First, as to Biennial Conference Recommendation No. 28, which proposes that "income should be guaranteed as a matter of right" and " must be high enough to meet basic human needs," we believe this does not involve a civil liberties issue in ACLU terms. The premise on which this proposal was submitted by the Biennial Conference was that the welfare system "contains severe and pervasive deprivations of civil liberties" and that such "deprivations are built in and intrinsic to the program itself."

Even if we assume these assertions to be true, it is obvious that abuses are possible not only under the present welfare system, but also under a "reformed" system or under any type of income maintenance program. Moreover, abuses in administering any program are not eliminated by the amount any family receives so long as eligibility to receive assistance is to be verified. The moral imperative in providing an amount "high enough to meet basic human needs" has very little to do with abuses of the system. Almost no discussion or analysis occurred at the Committee meetings on this moral imperative - a priori determinations (at least, so far as the Committee deliberation was concerned) were the basis of acceptance of the philosophy expressed in Biennial Conference Recommendation No. 28.

The economic and sociological aspects of this subject matter are, and should continue to be, outside of ACLU concerns. As individuals, we all must be interested in this complex subject. As civil libertarians, members of an organization with limited resources, purposes and skills, we should exclude this subject matter as one to which the ACLU commits its resources. We should work to keep the marketplace of ideas open for the public to debate how to resolve this complex and troublesome issue. We should work to point up the civil liberties deficiencies in the present welfare system. But the ACLU should not itself become involved in the merits of this issue in the marketplace.

The proponents of the Lesnick Report believe that "the right of every citizen to live" is not a matter on which the majority may justly claim a right to vote and, hence, it is a civil liberty. The proponents then say that "right to live" means "to enjoy access to an income adequate to insure a minimum standard of health and decency and a realistic prospect that his children can be raised with a fair chance of becoming fully functioning, fully free adults." So defined, we think the issue is still debatable in our society and that the scope of that debate lies outside of ACLU interest.

Despite the strong views of the Lesnick Report, we believe we are not "hopelessly myopic" in suggesting that there may be substantial contrary views on income maintenance and, even if there are not, that the subject matter is not an appropriate one for ACLU concern.

Second, the Lesnick Report, while not recommending the adoption of Biennial Conference Recommendation No. 28, has accepted it as a foot in the door, and proposes that the ACLU should become concerned with a much broader range of economic issues, including such governmental programs as education, housing and medical care (not to see if the benefits are distributed without discrimination or if the programs are administered fairly, but to determine if the programs are adequate.) With this view, we are even more in conflict. Moreover, although the Lesnick Report is not explicit, the implication is clear that there is no reason why the ACLU should not then become involved in the substance of any other governmental program affecting the disadvantaged or underprivileged. Here is the critical excerpt from the Lesnick Report:

> "In large areas of central concern -- primarily education, housing and medical care -- the needs of the poor are met, not by cash payments with which they can purchase services in the private market, but with direct programs in kind. And this will continue to be the case, notwithstanding the seeming attractiveness of new systems of income security."

In a sense, of course, the Lesnick Report is correct: every aspect of life bears on every other, just as the ripple caused by a pebble tossed into the ocean is felt around the world. But it is quite clear that if the ACLU enters the areas of governmental assistance to education, housing and medical care -- not the civil liberties aspects of these issues, but the economic and social merits thereof and their adequacy - logic will require us to tackle a number of other areas of our economic life which are quite as important as those just mentioned, to wit, food stamp programs, the extent of coverage and amounts of payments under the minimum wage law, the social security system, unemployment issurance law, workmen's compensation and disability laws, the farm subsidy program, the rate and methods of taxation of the income tax laws of the federal, state and municipal governments and whether these revenue laws are fairer than sales taxes, or those imposed on other aspects of our economy. From these fields, it is a short step to ACLU consideration of laws and policies relating to child day care centers, air and water pollution,* fair trade proceedings involving proper labeling of foods and drugs, "truth and lending" bills and a thousand other issues in which decent people should be interested.

This problem of the ever-increasing universe was aired at one of the two meetings of our Committee. The adherents of the Lesnick Report acknowledged that a problem existed and suggested that lines would probably have to be drawn somehow to limit our activities. Where these lines could rationally and logically be drawn

* Indeed, one affiliate has already determined that the pollution of water and seashore by off-shore oil drilling is an appropriate area of ACLU concern was not discussed. But, regardless of how or where they may be drawn, it is obvious that more and more people would find it more difficult to become or remain devoted members of the ACLU. For example, if minimum standards of public housing should be enunciated as a "civil liberty" by the ACLU, anyone who was opposed to public housing or to the standards of adequacy promulgated by the ACLU could no longer, at least in this respect, be a believer in civil liberties. If one disagreed with the kind of medical care system the ACLU Board decided is a "civil liberties" requirement (or if one is opposed to any governmentally subsidized medical care system), then he would not, to this extent, be a conscientious ACLU member. Of course, probably no member agrees with all ACLU positions, but, at least the area of disagreement relates to civil liberties issues - not economic and social programs.

Instead of concentrating our limited resources in preserving the Bill of Rights, we face the danger of each day becoming more parochial, limiting our members to those who believe to some greater or lesser extent, in a particular political or economic philosophy. The issue is more profound than whether our preoccupation with these varied and complex economic and social problems would divert us from devoting ourselves to civil liberties. There can be no doubt that it would. Nor is the issue simply whether the ACLU has the skills to grapple with the entire range of economic and social concerns of the United States. Clearly, it does not. The fundamental point is that, regardless of each of our own views as individuals on these complex matters, the ACLU, as the leading civil liberties organization in the U.S., should remain open for those who oppose or support a guaranteed annual income, for those who believe in and those who deplore government involvement in education, housing, medical care and a hundred other important economic and social problems, and for each of those who holds a different view on what that involvement should be.

It will, no doubt, be said that the kind of argument in this memo has been made many times before in ACLU debate, that civil liberties frontiers would not have been explored if traditional approaches to civil liberties matters had been followed, that it is important we become "relevant" to segments of the population upon whom we have had little influence in the past, and that the problems of civil liberties today are different than they were 30 or 50 years ago. Even if we were to agree with all of the foregoing, we would, nevertheless, suggest that the ACLU should stay out on this issue because it does not present a civil liberties issue by any standard.

We recall a number of instances in ACLU Board discussions when the argument was made that a certain issue should not be treated as one involving civil liberties. On each occasion, whether or not the Board accepted the premise that a civil liberties issue was presented, the quagmire into which the ACLU might have wandered if it were wrong was not nearly so deep as that with which we are faced at this time. For example, on the question of abolition of capital punishment, our involvement in the subject matter did not mean we were entering an entirely open field whose limits were unknown. The extent of our interest was both obvious and recognized. A similar situation existed when the ACLU became interested in the elimination of abortion laws and when we sought the abolition of laws prohibiting the dissemination of birth control information. Once more the area of our interest although expanded from what it was before, was obviously a definable one. It is not important for this discussion whether the ACLU was right or wrong in pursuing these new areas. What is important here is that, in these examples, when we stepped into a new field, we recognized the limits of our new area of interest. It is our contention that with respect to the issue before us now, as presented by the Lesnick Report and Biennial Conference Recommendation No. 28, there are no horizons, no boundaries, no limits at all.

For those who believe that the ACLU should become another generalized pressure group like the ADA, taking stands on every issue under the sun so long as a substantial portion of the Board feels strongly about the issue, there is no difficulty in deciding that ACLU should plunge into this entire economic and social area. Those holding this view are not impeded by the fact that neither the Board, members of our various committtes, nor the staff were selected for their economic or social skills or expertise.

For those who believe that the ACLU is a unique group with a special purpose and special skills to match that purpose, the problem is a critical one. Those of us who are interested in the economic and social aspects of the issues raised in the Lesnick Report (and, no doubt, most of us are) give time and effort to many other organizations involved in these subject matters. If the ACLU were to become involved in this kind of work too, it would be a duplication of effort to belong to it. But, more important, ACLU involvement in these areas would spell the end of the ACLU as we know it.

Statement on Welfare Programs

The ACLU strongly opposes the many aspects of our welfare system that violate basic concerns of fairness, dignity and privacy that are part of the fabric of civil liberties. To be poor is tragedy enough. To be forced to forego elementary rights of privacy and decency in order to obtain financial assistance is improper and violates the fundamental precepts of a democratic society.

The ACLU, therefore, will, among other efforts, support legislation, litigation and educational programs to protect:

(a) The right of privacy of the poor, by opposing such tactics as midnight visits to the homes of those receiving assistance, and by supporting the right of recipients of assistance to bar case workers from their homes (unless authorized by a search warrant) without fear of losing governmental assistance;

(b) The right to a hearing, with counsel if desired, for welfare applicants to recipients in connection with their right to assistance or respecting the reduction or termination of assistance;

(c) The right to travel freely and to live where they wish in accordance with their means, by opposing unreasonable state and local residence requirements or laws permitting the exiling of the poor to their previous state of residence.

The ACLU further believes that certain aspects of our welfare system should be analysed to determine whether previous abuses of the types described above may be eliminated or substantially reduced by new approaches designed to eliminate the kinds of situations which engender the abuses. Thus, the substitution, where possible, of visits by recipients to the office of the case worker in place of the latter's visits to the home may help eliminate the invasion of privacy to which many needy are subjected. The opportunity for a hearing on rejected claims for assistance (with counsel, if desired) should be encouraged by governmental agencies. Information as to the right to a hearing should be automatically distributed with the rejection notice itself.

These are examples of the type of programs that can be adopted if concern for the rights and dignity of the poor exists. This concern must be manifested for each of our inhabitants so that liberty and justice for all can be a reality rather than a slogan.

Additional Statement by Howard D. Samuel

The deprivation of civil liberties caused by economic inequality is not restricted to the very poor, as the Lesnick report suggests. In fact, in certain areas, such as medical care and housing, society treats the very poor slightly better than those just above some arbitrary line, who are not eligible for public housing or medicaid. Even the welfare system penalizes the not-so-poor; the costs of working (transportation, food, etc.) may reduce the standard of living of those working at low-paid, unskilled jobs below the standards of those on public assistance and not working at all.

In short, the vagaries of our economic system are difficult to subject to traditional civil liberties standards, and entering this morass with the rather unsophisticated and simplistic outlook suggested by the other report might not only lead to basic and unfortunate changes in the ACLU, as the Soll, Lusky, and Samuel report indicates, but would also make us look rather naive.

Separate Statement of Louis Lusky

Shortly before the June 12, 1969, meeting of the ACLU Committee on Government Benefit Programs, Mr. Lesnick as Chairman distributed to the committee a draft report which was the same, in substance, as the present recommendations of Messrs. Lesnick, Rothwax and Sparer. At the June 12 meeting I circulated the following comments on the Lesnick draft (and still adhere to these views):

> I am unable to join in the draft report of the committee chairman, transmitted to the members with his letter of June 9. Pursuant to the invitation contained in that letter, this separate statement is offered:
> 1. The draft report is based on premises which seem to me to be self-contradictory. It acknowledges that legislation as well as litigation is required for an effective approach to the problem. Yet it says that "the right of every citizen to live -- that is, to enjoy access to an income," etc. -- "is not a matter on which the majority may justly claim a right to vote."
> 2. The draft report is based on premises which seem to me to deny any limitation on the appropriate scope of ACLU concerns. Attacking as "simplistic dichotomy" the distinction "between affirmative governmental acts and mere passivity in privately-ordained inequalities," it declares that civil liberties principle requires ACLU to take a position against such inequalities. Without expressing an opinion on the merits of state socialism which would be necessary for the obliteration of "privately-ordained inequalities" -- I do question whether state socialism is required as a matter of civil liberties principle.

3. The draft report claims that "the poor, like the Negro or Indian or the politically unpopular, constitute one of the 'discrete and insular minorities'" -- referring to the Carolene Products footnote. The claim seems to me to be based on a misunderstanding of the term "discrete and insular minorities" as used in the said footnote. The political power of the poor, if mobilized and if permitted by the courts to have effect, is great.

4. The draft report ignores the question whether the dependent relationship between welfare client and caseworker, under the present system, offends the Thirteenth Amendment prohibition against involuntary servitude.

TO: Board of Directors

FROM: Special Committee on Government Benefit Programs

RE: Report for October 4-5 Board meeting.

This Committee was appointed, pursuant to a resolution adopted by the National Board on October 5, 1968, with the following charge:

> "to consider and report with recommendations to the Board in respect to the Biennial Conference recommendations on income maintenance, with the request that it devote particular attention to the recital in Resolution 28 that deprivations of civil liberties are built in and are intrinsic to the welfare program itself and the assumptions upon which the program is based, and that the committee further address its attention to whether similar disabilities affect other programs of public assistance (e.g. education, medical care)."

The Biennial Conference recommendations referred to are as follows:

> 28. Whereas (a) the present program of income maintenance, i.e., the welfare system, contains severe and pervasive deprivation of civil liberties; and (b) these deprivations are built in and intrinsic to the program itself and the assumptions on which the program is based; and (c) those who have been most deeply involved in the attempt to deal with such deprivations through litigation have testified to the inadequacy of such an approach; therefore the ACLU takes the position that, in order to meet the needs of the poor and the requirements of a free society, a program of income maintenance should be instituted, meeting the following two conditions:
> 1. Income should be guaranteed as a matter of right and provided under conditions posing no interference with basic freedoms.
> 2. The level of income maintenance guaranteed must be high enough to meet basic human needs.
> 29. That the Board appoint a committee to evaluate all legislative proposals for programs of income maintenance in the light of the principles of the resolution.
> 30. That ACLU lobby for or against specific proposals in light of the Committee's recommendations.
> 31. That ACLU continue to attack present abuses through legislation.

money she needs for her family (the procurer's commission goes to the taxpayers, whose agent the welfare official is) -- (3) the identical consequence ensured by the inadequate level of assistance is deemed another matter entirely, presenting no civil liberties concern? If it was not sufficient in the last century for the law to prohibit the rich as well as the poor from sleeping under bridges and begging in the streets, it is difficult to see how civil liberties concerns today are fully met merely because a school child would not be prohibited from reading Lady Chatterly's Lover in the school library, even though the school had no library; or the child was never taught to read in school; or was expelled or dropped out as a result of official hostility, ineptitude, and arbitrariness; or was unable to attend school enough because of lack of sufficient clothing, or because of illness attributable to a meaningful degree to the inadequacy of public medical care or the inability of public officials to save him from falling prey in his own home to lead poisoning incurred in his pre-school years by eating paint flakes fallen from the walls.

To add a more conceptual framework to this, we would rest our view that a "civil liberties" question is involved on two interrelated grounds.

(1) It hardly requires extended argument, to a body like the ACLU Board, to establish the premise that the major part of the economic dependency and deprivation which exists in this country is the product, not of individual want of diligency or moral worth, but of large-scale economic forces and social malfunctioning. The tenant farmer displaced by technological innovations; the older worker rendered superfluous by changing consumer preferences; the mother deserted by her husband; the urban youth "educated" by an under-financed, discriminatory school system, and functionally unemployable in the evolving labor market of his community -- one could multiply examples, but it is plain that society has produced, along with the accomplishments in which it takes pride, a substantial byproduct of deprivation, dependency and insecurity. In many cases, the economic changes that have intensified the problem are themselves the product of governmental encouragement or reward. The obligation to cope with these problems is equally society's obligation. Much of the heightened moral awareness of recent years reflects an acknowledgment that it is not enough simply to avoid purposeful infliction of harm; powerful social institutions must accept responsibility for the unintended, often unperceived, consequences of their good works.

The protection of the right of every citizen to live -- that is, to enjoy access to an income adequate to insure a minimum standard of health and decency and a realistic prospect that his children can be raised with a fair chance of becoming fully functioning, full free adults -- is not a matter on which the majority may justly claim a right to vote. Rather, like the right to express dissident views, it is a right which all may claim against the majority. It is therefore a civil liberty, and its protection may call upon the resouces of ACLU. Any contrary view rests in part on a dichotomy between affirmative governmental acts and mere passivity in privately-ordained inequalities, and in part on a fear of committing ACLU to the consideration of issues which our constitutional jurisprudence may require to be presented to non-judicial forums. The former seems to us hopelessly myopic in a society in which so broad a segment of our individual and collective wealth comes from governmental activity and benefits. As to the latter, we refer again to the Report of the Law School Task Force:

ACLU has long played a role in the legislative process, and such concern obviously will go beyond constitutional issues. At the same time, we recognize that much of ACLU's legislative work has been intimately connected with civil liberties in its narrower sense of constitutional right. First, it opposes legislation which on enactment it would challenge as unconstitutional. Moreover, in many instances where ACLU has gone further, there is a readily identifiable constitutional nexus. For example, in supporting open housing legislation, ACLU can think of itself as seeking legislative implementation of the constitutional right of Negroes and other minorities to equal protection. In supporting a bill of rights for union members, ACLU may reason that the quasi-public character of labor unions makes it appropriate to seek protections, analogous to those found in the Bill of Rights, for the worker's political life within his union. But the affirmative and analogical character of these connections to constitutional rights should demonstrate that similar perceptions may be appropriate in the economic-security field. If, as we believe clear, the constitutional right to the equal protection of the laws applies not merely to invidious discriminations based on race, but to similarly hostile classifications founded on proverty or dependency, it must be recognized that the affirmative implementation of equal protection in matters having to do with welfare, housing, education, and medical care seeks to foster values having their source in the Constitution. To be sure, this is not to say that they are constitutionally compelled, just as the enactment of civil-rights or union-democracy laws was an exercise of discretion. But the unavailability of a litigable constitutional claim is not itself ground for finding no civil liberties matter worthy of ACLU support.

It seems to us that ACLU can and should avoid two polar vices: indefinite expansion, consciously or otherwise, of claims of constitutional right, leading in all likelihood to eventual judicial rebuff, and in any event inescapably insufficient to meet the need; and failure to perceive important civil liberties radiations in claims which fall short of legally enforceable constitutional right. Rather it should recognize that, since there is much which has an intimate connection with constitutional rights but is not itself constitutionally protected, a fully effective concern with civil liberties in our present society requires that it be seen as having a substantial non-constitutional dimension. The constitutional base is there, and can be invoked validly albeit metaphorically. An organization historically specializing in constitutional rights can appropriately ask legislatures to implement values reflected in the fundamental law, even though their implementation goes beyond the role of courts.

To be sure, it may be thought unsettling to leave the seeming certainty of claims of legal right and enter the controversy of political rhetoric, But the certainty is an illusion: Today's law is built on yesterday's rhetoric. ACLU members would for the most part now accept the dictum that the Civil War Amendments provide a sufficient constitutional foundation for a nation-wide program to achieve racial equality through affirmative action. Until recently such a view has been highly controversial as a political proposition, though today it is probably on the verge of judicial espousal as legal doctrine.

Where the issue concerns the right to a job or to minimum income, or to fair opportunities to participate in benefits widely available through governmental programs (as in the case of housing, education, and medical care), we are today at the early political state, and the legal prognosis is not wholly clear. The organization may or may not commit itself to urging a similar judicial denouement, but it would be an act of uncharacteristic opacity for ACLU to perceive no analogy. Even today, the implementation of racial equality raises the most vexing of policy problems, often presented as conflicting claims of constitutional right. It is one thing for ACLU to move slowly in choosing which programs to committ itself to. It is quite another matter to see in the existence of controversy and complexity warrant for total abstinence.

(2) ACLU has long ago rejected the notion that the protection of liberty and the elimination of inequality are wholly unrelated concerns. The right of racial and ethnic minorities to the equal protection of the laws is now viewed as a claim within the concern of this organization. The right of political segments of the electorate to be free of enduring and severe crippling of their franchise through malapportionment is similarly not deemed a matter to be pursued by others. Indeed, it is worth recalling that even First-Amendment protections are as much guarantees of equality as of liberty. As Professor Amsterdam has cogently pointed out:

> Realistically, these and kindred guarantees are guarantees only to castoffs and undesirables, deviates, Negroes. In essense all are guarantees of equal protection of the laws. The mayor and the chief of police of Canton, Mississippi or Chicago, Illinois would never be arrested if they picketed a courthouse. Of course, the mayor and the police chief never will picket the courthouse; therefore the problem presented when Negores are arrested for picketing the courthouse does not seem at first blush to be an equal protection problem. Nevertheless, the forces which assure that if the mayor and policy chief picketed the courthouse they would not be arrested are the same forces which assure that the mayor and the police chief will never be the sort of men who will want to picket the courthouse, and that whatever the mayor and police chief want done in the courthouse will be communicated to the courthouse in other and more effective ways than picketing.
> Although abstractly accurate, it is perfectly absurd to say that the mayor and police chief have federally guaranteed immunities to make a speech, cast a vote, or walk the sidewalks of their towns. They do not need these immunities. The Constitution gives them nothing. Such protection as the Constitution gives, it gives to those in sore need, those whom other protections have failed . . . ."
> (113 U. Pa. L. Rev. at 800-01)

The time has plainly arrived for ACLU to recognize that the poor, like the Negro or Indian or the politically unpopular, constitute one of the "discrete and insular minorities" (Chief Justice Stone, in the celebrated Carolene Products opinion 304 U.S. at 153 n.4) whose claim to be free of official and community hostility, prejudice and arbitrariness presents a compelling civil liberties issue. We are no longer paralyzed by the contention that racial segregation is simply separation of one group from another, denying neither equal protection because each is equally segregated. Rather we perceive the subordination, denigration and hostility which accompanies this action by one group against another.

ACLU should recognize that the same process is at work against the poor, in welfare administration and in other programs of government benefits and services. To be sure, the poor are not a group with as readily identifiably and as permanent contours as are racial minorities, adherents of unpopular religions or the like. But in our judgment they suffer like deprivations. It should be recalled that ours is probably the only country in history whose poor are a minority, and 18th Century notions of the political potency of the lower-class "multitudes" are sadly out of place.

We do not, however, recommend adoption of Conference Resolution 28. First, it relfects a naive dichotomy between "the present program of income maintenance, i.e., the welfare system," containing pervasive and intrinsic deprivations of civil liberties, and a hypothetical alternative program which would be free of these flaws. To refer once more to the Report of the Law School Task Force:

> It would be illusory to think that simple legislative solutions exist to bypass long-standing denials of constitutional rights in the existing welfare program. It is not difficult -- although not very easy -- to construct a model negative income tax, family allowance, or other income-maintenance system which lacks the pervasive discretion and recipient-mistrust which poison the public assistance program. But it would not be much more difficult to build a model set of amendments to the public assistance law, which if enacted would go very far indeed to change the landscape. The abolition of the present categories of federal assistance; elimination of restrictive eligibility provisions not reflective of need; abolition of relative responsibilty laws, or the abrogation of required resort to support suits as a condition of assistance; elimination of the dollar-for-dollar reduction in assistance as a result of earned income; a more generous and rational set of rules on permitted retention of resources such as dwellings, insurance policies, and personal property; elimination of the present system of establishing need through the wasteful and humiliating verification process -- one should not too lightly dismiss the change that would come about through the adoption of these and a few other readily draftable provisions.
> The point of course, is that, in the present political climate, their adoption and retention seems unlikely in the extreme. Yet, proponents of federal income-maintenance legislation as a panacea seem to lose sight of that political fact of life in designing their model. All of the pressures which have warped the public assistance apparatus would, slowly or quickly, leave their mark on a negative income tax plan. It is a political common place to see reform legislation, even if adopted in relatively pure form, gradually succumb to the accumulation of limitations, counter-policies, and political backlash. It is only while a negative income tax system remains on the drawing board that it is easy to lose sight of the dozens of specific fact situations which, once the system were implemented, would each produce wide-spread political dispute and reaction. The most that can be said for the "new broom" attitude toward federal income maintenance legislation is that it might conceivably slip through an unusually liberal Congress, and transfer the burden of maintaining the assault to the forces presently enjoying the benefits of the laws of inertia. Even that hope seems to us a vain one. It is certainly chimerical to expect more. Thus, while the concept of an integrated federal income-maintenance program certainly merits support, it should not be thought of as a means for solving deep-seated problems with a single knockout punch.

Second, Resolution 28 makes no attempt to relate the principles which animate it to areas of governmental activity other than income maintenance which, in our judgment, cannot be satisfactorily distinguished. For it is evident that the area of concern is wider than income maintenance alone. Cash grants are a small part of the means by which government responds. In large areas of central concern -- primarily education, housing and medical care -- the needs of the poor are met, not by cash payments with which they can purhcase services in the private market, but with direct programs in kind. And this will continue to be the case, notwithstanding the seeming attractiveness of new systems of income security. The pervasive inadequacies of these programs, the existence of arbitrary exclusions from coverage, their hostile manner of administration -- these are as fully deserving of ACLU concern as is the public assistance program.

We propose the adoption of the following recommendations by the National Board, in lieu of Conference Recommendations 28 through 32:

1. ACLU believes that it is an obligation of government to ensure the right of every citizen to live. The guarantee of the right to live requires that income maintenance programs assure all of the inhabitants of our society a level of income adequate to meet basic human needs, under eligibility rules and administration free of arbitrary, invidious or hostile restrictions. Programs of governmental benefits or services -- such as education, housing and medical care -- which are essential to the growth of our children into free citizens must similarly be available to all, adequately financed and free of arbitrary exclusions.

2. To carry out ACLU's commitment to these principles, the Board directs the appointment of a standing Committee on Minimum Standards of Economic Security (Governmental Benefits and Services). Local affiliates are urged to constitute similar committees. The National Committee will develop positions and specific areas of interest regarding litigation and legislation in the areas of income maintenance and programs of government benefits and services, and will engage in educational activities, within ACLU and addressed to the larger community.

NEWSLETTER MARCH 1970

THEATRE PARTY "Z" ROXY THEATRE

FRIDAY APRIL 3 - 8 P.M.

This is a fund raising event with moneys earmarked for litigation. Besides that compelling reason for your attendance is the caliber of the movie. Acclaimed by all the critics, nominated for the Academy Award, it is very relevant to our ACLU interests.

The enclosed flyer contains the Time Magazine review and a list of the awards clipped from the New York Times. Pauline Kael in the New Yorker Magazine wrote.."Remember when the movie ads used to say, "it will knock you out of your seat"? Well "Z" damn near does.

"Z" is based on a novel about the assassination of Gregorious Lambrakes in Salonika in 1963. Lambrakes, it may be recalled, was a professor of medicine at the University of Athens who was also a legislator and a spokesman for peace. He was struck down by a delivery truck as he left a peace meeting - a murder planned to look like an accident. The investigation of his death uncovered such a scandalous network of corruption and illegality in the police and in the government that the leader of the opposition party, George Papandreou, became Premier. But in April 1967, the military coup d'etat overturned the legal government. "Z" reenacts the murder and the investigation in an attempt to demonstrate how the mechanics of Facist corruption may be hidden under the mask of law and order..."

It would be unbearable not to be able to discuss this movie with friends, afterward, so we will gather at the Kitfield residence, 133 17th Street for coffee and pastries and conversation.

The modest tab for this exciting evening is $4.50 per person. Fill out the application for your reservation as soon as possible so that we can plan accordingly. Reservations are limited.

(Some folks are having dinner parties before the movie - sounds like fun.)

MEMBERSHIP RECRUITMENT

April is the month for a big push to get new members. On three Sundays we are meeting with prospective members to explain our purposes and activities. We would appreciate it if you would fill out the enclosed sheet that lists friends of yours who might be contacted and mail it in right away.

Emory University is offering a non credit short course for adults in the evening entitled Civil Liberties and the nice somebody teaching it is William H. Traylor, Director of the Emory Community Legal Services Center, an outstanding ACLU member. This course came about because of our urging. Films from Encyclopedia Brittanica on the Gideon Case, the Feiner Case and the Prince Edward County Case will be used as will texts concerning Courts, the Judiciary and the Bill of Rights. DESEGREGATION

There is a general feeling of unease, a feeling of being deceived, lulled, and lied to about the whole school desegregation picture. Recent headlines announce that the Supreme Court will be rethinking the whole issue - this following the double talk and flim flam from the Justice Department and H.E.W. plus Carswell's nomination to that court.

The real clincher is in the works however. In a March 17 article by Duane Riner in the Atlanta Constitution the outlines become apparent. We quote:

> "Two North Carolina Congressmen introduced a bill defining a unitary school system as one in which pupils are assigned to schools nearest their home.
>
> The bill, the brain child of a liberal Yale University Law Professor Alexander Bickel would continue the federal drive for desegregation "but not to the tipping point of resegregation," according to its sponsors Representatives Richardson Preyer and Nick Galifianakis.
> The bill would allow retention of some all-black and all-white schools and cut down drastically on the need for busing.
> The authors have cited the flight of Atlanta whites to the suburbs as an example of the type of resegregation they're attempting to prevent.
> Preyer, a former Federal Judge, claimed a broad spectrum of support for his bill, > which he said is the result of work "by many people from various parts of the country"...an aide to Preyer said Professor Bickel who expressed his views on the resegregation trend in a February 7 article in the New Republic was invited to the White House for a recent Sunday luncheon with presidential assistants."

Bearing in mind that the Atlanta School Board's latest plan locks pupils into neighborhood schools, leaving some all black and all white and most nearly so - the irony and full circle becomes evident.

The Atlanta School Board's purpose, through its long, extended court case (Calhoun versus Latimer) has been to obey only grudgingly the courts latest directive and in fact has hastened the white exodus to the suburbs by building its finest, newest schools in the solidly all white suburbs - and the center of the black ghettos and letting the schools in the transitional areas physically go to pot.

Indeed, it has been documented in an illustrative manner what the real purpose of the school adminstration was in the case of the Kirkwood elementary school.

In January 1965, Kirkwood elementary, previously all white, changed to an almost totally all Negro school. All the pupils previously attending Kirkwood had been permitted to leave. The school was centered in an area which human relations groups had hoped to stabilize, heading off resegregation.

When Dr. Letson testified at a court hearing in February 1965, he said the board had agreed to let Negro pupils transfer to Kirkwood in January but admitted he had previously sent a letter to white parents notifying them of the impending action and informing them they could transfer elsewhere if they wished. He repeated that Kirkwood was in a "transitional neighborhood." On the same day some 500 Negroes entered Kirkwood all but six whites had transfered out. The white faculty was transfered with the students.

Another illustration of the circle, the real thinking about desegregation through "neighborhood" school's can be gleaned from Judge Hooper's opinion of September 30, 1960, nineteen sixty that is, in the Calhoun vs Latimer case. He wrote:

> "It now seems clear that the people of Atlanta and Fulton County would prefer to have said Plan put into operation, then to have Atlanta's schools closed. It is quite evident that many other populous centers in Georgia have the same feeling. This feeling is not shared by citizens living in the rural areas for two reasons. First, they do not have the residential patterns that exist in the cities, which patterns as formerly pointed out by this Court, would result in the schools located in the white areas being practically all white and those located in Negro areas to consist almost altogether, if not totally, of Negroes. Such a situation, coupled with a Pupil Assignment Plan on application of the students, would cause little mixing. The residential patterns in the country, however, would not give this advantage."

PRESS RELEASE

Southern Regional Council, Inc.
5 Forsyth Street, N. W.
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

FOR RELEASE TO MORNING PAPERS:
SUNDAY, APRIL 5, 1970

ATLANTA -- A well-known Southern liberal said today that a new White House policy on race, abetted by black separatists and some Northern liberals, threatens to reimpose old racial patterns on the nation.

Charles Morgan, Jr., attorney in school desegregation and other civil liberties cases, said recent developments provide respectability for "an all-out and undisguised attack on desegregation." Mr. Morgan, now Southern director of the American Civil Liberties Union, expressed his views in an article in SOUTH TODAY, a monthly digest published by the Southern Regional Council.

"The enemy is no longer the racism of the statehouse," he said. "The opponents are now those who occupy the White House and in tragi-comedy enter a field of politics in which they, too, are destined to lose if simply because they lack the hatred required to effect a successful Southern strategy. To white Southern segregationists they will soon seem but 'an effete corps of impudent snobs.'"

Morgan described those liberals who now justify a slowdown in efforts toward school integration as "New Paternalists" who are replacing old-fashioned paternalists in seeking to determine the future of Negroes. The "New Paternalists," he said, are those who simultaneously accept the separatist arguments of Southern white supremacists and of blacks who call themselves militants.

"As white Southern housewives relied on their maids, the New Paternalists rely only upon 'militant' blacks," he said. "The New Paternalism refuses to grant blacks an equal right with whites to be damned fools and to be told they are damned fools. The New Paternalism calls for the upgrading of slums and slum schools as though that goal were somehow shown to be attainable either by our history or our present inclination. CORE's Roy Innis roams the South, after building a solid record of non-results in the North, seeking new school districts to separate. The New Paternalist nods approvingly."

Because of these confusions, Morgan said, Southern segregationists suddenly are making headway again. "White Southern politicians. . . simply struggle along for years losing battle after battle, fighting as guerrillas, until they finally very politely win," he said. "As they turn America away from its stated goals, they mind their manners. . . ."

Commenting on recent contentions that the South has been treated differently from the rest of the country on school integration and should not be, Morgan said:

"The South had slavery by law. The South had segregation, apartheid, by law. This is why the South has been treated differently by the Supreme Court. The South is different. That is why it should be treated differently. That is why the Northern 'solution' -- if that be what de facto segregation is -- will not work in the South. Nor, if it were uniformly applied across the land, would it result in much other than at best the ultimate disfranchisement and at worst the dispatch of the nation's black population."

Morgan assailed a recent article by Alexander M. Bickel, a Yale University law professor, in the New Republic. The article, which has been the center of a national debate, suggested that massive school integration will not soon be attained in the nation and no one is certain it is worth the cost. It said stress now should be placed upon education.

Morgan said Bickel and Sen. Abraham Ribicoff, who recently joined Southern senators on some school integration votes, have come to their views because of their own Northern big-city orientations and "white minority ethnic-group thinking." He added: "Relying on 'cultural pluralism,' as Stokely Carmichael did in proposing Black Power and citing Jewish Power and Irish Power as his model, is a common failure of many of those who deal with the South on the basis of non-Southern experience. They forget that in the South there was no melting pot and there is little pluralism of any kind, be it ethnic or religious. . . . There can be little parallel between the urban experiences of white ethnic Americans and the experience of American blacks."

Morgan noted that Professor Bickel, referring to the argument that integration sometimes tips schools racially and results in resegregation, suggested that this "is what the Nixon administration has been trying to tell us...." But, Morgan said: "What President Nixon has been trying to tell us is simply" 'White folks, vote Republican; we can do it better than Wallace can -- and we can do it more politely.'"

Those forces which place high priority upon ending patterns of segregation will ultimately prevail, Morgan wrote, despite some defections from their ranks and some current national trends. "We will win," he said, "simply because we must."

REVIEW and OUTLOOK

W-S-J 12/27/71

A Mysterious Affliction

When the American Civil Liberties Union announced its opposition to Supreme Court nominee William Rehnquist, its chairman carefully noted that opposing a candidate for public office was an unprecedented step for the group. We presume the idea was to stress how horrible the nominee must be, but it now seems that the broken precedent tells us less about Mr. Rehnquist than about the current state of the ACLU.

For it happens that the increasing politicization of the union, and its decreasing emphasis on strict questions of civil liberty, has been carefully traced by Yale Law Professor Joseph W. Bishop Jr. His attack on it is quite different from the historic right-wing assaults, being full of praise for the ideals and historic accomplishments of the ACLU and indeed for much of its current work. But in its most celebrated current efforts, he argues, it is starting to destroy its own ideals.

The problem is that the union is abandoning its defense of limited but cardinal goals such as free speech, and is setting to remake the world in the image of the radical left. It is entirely fitting that Mr. Bishop's article should appear in "Commentary," one of the few remaining bastions of sensible liberalism, for it concerns not merely the ACLU, but a broader flight from reality that seems to have possessed the most conspicuous parts of the liberal community.

Since the original ideal of the union was to protect the liberties of all unpopular minorities, Mr. Bishop asks, why can you search through its ninety-odd active court cases without finding a right-wing client? Why does it criticize the treatment of dissidents in Canada but not in Cuba? What question of civil liberties is involved in the New York dispute over community control of schools, in which the ACLU's local affiliate has been involved? What constitutional issue explains involvement in the Berrigan case?

Above all, where is the ACLU on the current clear and present danger to freedom of speech, the efforts of campus radicals to suppress views with which they differ? Out trying to overturn injunctions obtained by the University of Connecticut against obscene and disruptive statements in demonstrating against campus recruiters, that's where.

What emerges, in short, is something less related to civil liberties than to radical chic. The source of the new crusades lies in the state of mind of some of the union's members and nearly all of its staff; its legal director says, "We are not yet a fascist state in general." And this attitude is profoundly antithetical to civil liberties per se; "Hyde Park speeches or Tom Paine leaflets," one activist says, don't mean a lot compared to "social justice."

The fascinating thing about this state of mind is its lack of contact with reality. Mr. Bishop finds himself explaining that there is a difference between the government of the United States and the government of Stalinist Russia, that there is a difference between Spiro Agnew and Joseph Goebbels.

"The union's attitude toward a constitutional and democratic government need not and should not be always, or even usually, that of Ralph Nader to General Motors," Mr. Bishop warns. Indeed, it is only under effective government that civil liberty can be maintained:

"A man whose government does not protect him from thieves and marauders is likely to lose concern for criminal due process and to support the first strong man who promises short shrift for criminals. The stability of the government of the United States and the survival of the liberties provided by its Constitution depend on its continued ability to enforce its constitutional laws by constitutional methods—including laws which are unwise, but not unconstitutional."

These are elementary observations, of course, but somehow they need repeating today. The questions, as Harvard sociologist Nathan Glazer has nicely put it, are so old we have forgotten the answers. It is comforting to have people like Mr. Bishop, and magazines like "Commentary," spelling them out for us once again.

But in the meantime, there is a new and as far as we know unanswered question to ponder. What mysterious affliction has seized the minds of so many of our best people, leaving them unable to understand the simple answers, unable to recognize their own traditional values, unable to distinguish between dream and reality?

MINUTES - EMERGENCY MEETING OF THE EXECUTIVE BOARD OF THE ACLU OF GA. - MARCH 13, 1972

Members present: Margie Hames, Nat Gozansky, Ed Ladd, John Mullroy, Faye Goldberg, Emory Via, Patsy Morris, Austin Ford, Bob Tuve, John Mather, Anne McNay, Jon Johnston, Chuck Morgan, Hugh Gibert, Ruste Kitfield.

Meeting was called to order at 12:20 PM by Jon Johnson. National ACLU requested and got Ga. Board support for the repeal of marijuana laws.

At the request of the Better Schools Atlanta group (which has several ACLUers) the Ga. Board met to consider our intervention in the Atlanta school case (NAACP v. School Board?) for a Richmond, Va. metropolitan-type plan. A vigorous discussion developed, with Chuck Morgan leading off on schools, political lines seen as arbitrary, and strategy ideas. Austin Ford commented on the hostility problems of one-way busing. Emory Via questioned the effectiveness and/or destructiveness of intervention as it applies to the values of integration. Margie Hames discussed where she was in terms of contact with NAACP (several lawyers), deadlines, and whether intervention or a new case was the best option. Motion by Nat, 2nd by Bob Tuve as follows: "Board approves plan to enter into, or commence our own suit, against Atlanta School Board to try to get comprehensive integration of schools in Atlanta area (5 county) as in Richmond, Va. plan." This motion passed, with several votes in absention. Voted on previous to the above motion, and failing 7-3, was this motion by Ed Ladd, 2nd by Faye Goldberg "Motion to refer matter to a committee to be appointed by chairman, that the committee report back to the Board meeting to be called for later in the week; that the meeting be held in two parts, with visitors who can contribute, followed by closed Board meeting." Margie Hames requested an advisory committee which Jon will appoint. Meeting adj.

Impending Ruling by Federal Judge Promises Hope for Neglected in Mental Institutions Around Country

By BOYCE RENSBERGER

After more than a century of neglect, thousands of mentally disabled citizens, once doomed to lives of deprivation and hopelessness in public mental institutions around the country, are expected to find new hope in a decision to be handed down by a Federal district judge in Alabama in the next week or two.

Earlier in the 19-month-long case, Judge Frank M. Johnson ruled, for the first time in any court, that persons deprived of their liberty and committed to such institutions because they were mentally ill or mentally retarded had a constitutional right to adequate treatment.

Now, on the basis of his previous rulings, he is expected to hand down in Montgomery a set of minimum standards for care and treatment and to rule that institutions that do not meet the standards are violating their patients' constitutional rights.

While the suit he heard involves only Alabama's two state hospitals and one state school, several national mental health and legal organizations have said that they plan to file similar suits in many other states.

Suit Filed in New York

Since the first Alabama ruling, in fact, such suits have been filed against an institution for the retarded in Massachusetts and against New York's Willowbrook State School.

The suits are expected by their sponsors to have little difficulty in winning favorable decisions, many people in the field concede that elimination of injustices done toward the mentally disabled is long overdue.

Currently, some 570,000 people are confined to state institutions for the mentally disabled in the United States. Most of the institutions, in the opinion of many mental health experts, would fall well below the standards that Judge Johnson is expected to set on the basis of the recommendations of a number of prominent mental health experts who testified before him earlier this year.

Judge Johnson, who issued many of the historic desegregation rulings in the South over the last 15 years, has said that he would establish and enforce standards designed to ensure three conditions: a humane psychological and physical environment, qualified staff in numbers sufficient to administer adequate treatment, and individualized treatment plans.

The final ruling is also expected to include a stipulation that, inasmuch as long-term hospitalization often leads to deterioration rather than improvement, no patient may be confined against his will for longer than six months.

The judge has also indicated that he plans to appoint a "Federal master" to administer the Alabama institutions and bring them quickly into compliance with his standards. The master would have power to circumvent procedural delays.

The Alabama case began in September, 1970, when a budget cut forced the head of the State Mental Health Department, Dr. Stonewall B. Stickney, to lay off a number of employes at Bryce Hospital, one of Alabama's two large mental hospitals.

The employes filed suit in Federal District Court charging that the layoff threatened the quality of care at Bryce and denied patients a constitutional right to treatment.

Such a concept, though never set forth in an official opinon, was raised by David L. Bazelon, Chief Judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in a decision five years ago. In that case, Judge Bazelon declared that the plaintiff, a mental patient, had at least a statutory right to treatment so long as he was to be deprived of his liberty on the ground that he needed treatment.

George Dean, attorney for the plaintiffs in the Alabama case, said that, when the potential national implications of the suit were realized, the suit was enlarged to a class action including the state's two other large institutions, Searcy Hospital and Partlow State School.

A number of national organizations joined the case as "friends of the court" to help carry out investigations of the institutions and recommend changes. They included the American Psychological Association, the National Legal Aid and Defenders Association, the American Orthopsychiatric Association, the American Civil Liberties Union and the Center for the Law and Social Policy. The last three groups have formed a National Council on the Rights of the Mentally Impaired to bring similar suits in other states.

United States Attorney Ira DeMent in Montgomery also entered the case on behalf of the Federal Government and has led much of the investigation.

"The things we found in these institutions are an outrage," Mr. DeMent said. "There's neglect to the point that deaths have resulted. If I knew who to blame, I'd prosecute the criminal. But you can't prosecute the system that has let such things happen in every state."

As the case unfolded over recent months, the plight of the overcrowded and understaffed institutions became front-page news in several Alabama dailies, which published hundreds of articles, pictures and editorials. Many of them portrayed the institutions as decaying firetraps in which miserable children and adults were forced to endure degrading conditions with little or no treatment or habilitation.

Judge Johnson, a long-time target for his rulings ordering integration in Alabama, came in for praise in editorials that said, in effect, that if there ever was a case of the Federal Government meddling in the sovereign affairs of a state, this was it, but that this time it was jusitfied because the state had clearly failed to carry out its responsibility.

Though he is the target of much of the outrage, Dr. Stickney, the State's Mental Health Commissioner, is not fighting the court's action.

"We recognize that there are serious problems here," he said. "In fact, we've recognized it for a lot longer than the court has and we've been trying to make improvements, but we have not had the resources to do it."

In his last budget request, Dr. Stickney asked for an 83 per cent increase. The Legislature and Gov. George C. Wallace cut the rise to 38 per cent. Now, in view of the court's impeding ruling, there is talk of a special legislative session to raise more money.

"Actually," Dr. Stickney said, "it's kind of exhilerating to see that the courts may get the Legislature going. It's been our experience that they'd rather spend money for highways than mental health."

Earlier this month, investigations at the Partlow State School for the retarded disclosed such deficiencies that Judge Johnson issued an interim emergency order "to protect the lives and well-being of the residents," which he said were threatened by such things as the absence of minimal fire safety measures, poor sanitation in the kitchen, poor control over the distribution of drugs and so few employes that many wards lacked proper supervision.

The emergency order called for correction of these and other deficiencies within periods ranging from 10 days to 45 days.

The most dramatic was an order to hire immediately 300 additional ward workers within 30 days. Judge Johnson ordered the state to forget about Civil Service or "any other formal procedure" that would delay the hiring.

Within days after the order was made public, more than 1,000 persons applied for jobs and the quota was met.

Re: Policy on Amnesty

In December 1970, the Board adopted the following resolution on amnesty:

> Whereas the present military involvement of United States in South East Asia is unconstitutional;
> Whereas the Selective Service Law is unconstitutional under present circumstances and as presently administered;
>
> And whereas regardless of the unconstitutionality of said military involvement and said Law,
> Punishment for violations should be mitigated so as to take account of the growing recognition that American participation in the Vietnam War has long been a mistake.
> Therefore be it resolved that full and unconditional amnesty should be granted to persons accused or convicted heretofore or hereafter of violating said Selective Service Law.
> The ACLU recommends amnesty for those who are or have been in the Armed Services who expose themselves to punishment for acts and omissions having a conscientious basis including a serviceman whose conscientious objection to service has been rejected on the ground that the objection is (a) non-religious or (b) to a particular war rather than to all wars or who have been court-martialed for disobeying a lawful order by reason of his persistence in his objection.

In February, 1972, the Executive Committee considered a proposal from the Michigan ACLU to amend this policy statement to make clear that the "acts" referred to in this statement did not include violent acts. The Michigan affiliate proposed that the final paragraph of the resolution be reworded to read:

> The ACLU also recommends amnesty for those who are or have been in the Armed Forces whose conscientious objection -- to military service, or to wars generally, or to a particular war -- has led to their punishment for their failure to cooperate with the Armed Forces.

The Executive Committee agreed that the Michigan formulation was a proper clarification of the ACLU resolution, provided that the non-religious reference in the resolution was retained. We believe, however, that the recommendation contained in the present memorandum would meet the substantive issue presented by the Michigan ACLU and at the same time incorporate other needed improvements in the ACLU policy position on amnesty.

At the time the Michigan proposal was considered, the Committee also discussed the view of the newly established Amnesty Project of the ACLU Foundation (established in January, 1972 with special foundation grants) that additional amendment of the policy statement was desirable. The Executive Committee took the view that these additional amendments would require consideration by the full Board. At the same time, in recognition of the rapidly growing public concern with amnesty and the crowded agenda of the committee which would normally consider any proposed change in policy prior to submission to the Board, the Executive Committee asked that staff submit its proposed change in policy directly to the Board.

We recommend to the Board that the last paragraph of the present policy statement be deleted and that, in its place, the following paragraph be adopted:

> The ACLU urges amnesty for those who are or have been in the Armed Services and have exposed themselves to punishment for acts and omissions which, if committed by a civilian in a civilian context, would not be constitutionally punishable under the criminal law.

The effect of this change would be:

1) To incorporate the change sought by the Michigan ACLU since assaults, destruction of property, thefts, etc., would be constitutionally punishable under the criminal law if committed by a civilian in a civilian context.

2) It would eliminate the requirement that a conscientious motive for such acts and ommissions as desertion or refusal to obey a lawful order be a condition for amnesty.

Since the thrust of the Michigan ACLU amendment is probably not very controversial within the ACLU Board, we shall focus the rest of this memo on the shift from the requirement of a conscientious basis for acts and omissions by those who are or have been in the Armed Services to the more inclusive amnesty contemplated in this proposed change in policy.

The preamble to the Board's December 1970 policy on amnesty makes it clear that the policy is first of all rooted in our belief that both the war and the draft are unconstitutional. For this reason, the December 1970 policy commits us to support amnesty for all those who have evaded the draft, regardless of whether their evasion of the draft has a conscientious basis. Not all draft resisters are motivated by high moral, ideological or religious beliefs. Nevertheless, we advocate the application of amnesty to them all, no matter what their motives for resisting what we regard as an illegal war and an illegal draft.

However, under the December 1970 policy, if a young person should be inducted into the armed forces and, six weeks later join draft resisters of whatever motivation in exile in Canada, that inductee would be required to meet a test of conscientious motivation. This is an inconsistency of approach which appears to imply that our basic belief in the unconstitutionality of the war and the draft is somehow nullified by taking the step forward for induction. Once that step is taken only a conscientious objection to service is considered by the December, 1970 policy as an appropriate ground for amnesty.

We believe there is another major defect in the December 1970 policy statement's requirement that persons once inducted into the armed forces meet a test of conscience before benefitting from amnesty. No one can be more aware than the ACLU that there is no agency less appropriate for assessing matters of conscience than the government. Many of the deserters who have exiled themselves think the government should be apologizing to them rather than forgiving them. It will hardly appear to them as an effort at reconciliation if the government offers to them the right to return to face the scrutiny of an amnesty board which will determine whether they were conscientiously motivated in their acts and omissions. (And what happens if they return to have their consciences tested -- and fail? Will they then be prosecuted? Hardly any would gamble on return under these circumstances?) By and large, the affluent and articulate were spared from the military service -- they found shelter in the reserves, in college deferments and in conscientious objection. If ordered to fight against their consciences, they went to prison, exile or underground. The disproportionate burdens of fighting this war have fallen upon the poor and poorly educated. And often, when their consciences were violated; their only recourse was desertion. They submitted to induction and became aware only in the military of the cruelties and irrationalities of the war. It is these men, too, who in glaringly disproportionate numbers have been tried by military courts for various offenses and who have been given less than honorable discharges -- impediments for their future lives and careers. The circumstances which impelled both refusal and desertion were the same: the war and the draft. The motives were usually the same: a refusal to submit to the machinery of the war. The war served as an instrument of class discrimination; amnesty must not. All non-violent acts and failures to act, we urge, that arose out of the war, that would not have occurred but for the war, and that might be subject to criminal penalties, should be included in amnesty. Similarly, any tests of the motives of those who have refused to fight the war would discriminate against the inarticulate. Those who have pleaded conscientious objection to war have already had to undergo searing examination of their motives. The less sophisticated have suffered from discrimination -- and it would be a cruel irony to make amnesty another means of discrimination.

The post-World War II experience with amnesty is instructive. According to a recent law review article, the Truman Amnesty Board "compiled data concerning the family history, school and work records, criminal records, and selective service history of each offender. In considering this data the Board used no specific standards or formulae." As a result of the work of this Amnesty Board, President Truman granted pardons to just 1,523 of the 15,805 persons whose cases were before the Board (see: "American Deserters and Draft Evaders: Exile, Punishment or Amnesty," by Douglas W. Jones and David L. Raish, Harvard International Law Journal, Volume 13, Number 1, at page 124). If this most recent American experience with amnesty were to guide the operations of a post-Vietnam Amnesty Board, overwhelming class and race discrimination would result from making amnesty for inductees contingent on the ability to meet a test of conscience.

The December 1970 policy also states in its preamble that "regardless of the unconstitutionality of said military involvement and said /draft/ law, punishment should be mitigated so as to take account of the growing recognition that American participation in the Vietnam War has long been a mistake." This statement affirms a need for amnesty because of the importance to civil liberties of healing of the wounds left by the divisions over the war in Vietnam. If that healing of the wounds is any part of our concern with amnesty, it would follow that the amnesty we support should be broadly inclusive. Unless we apply to post-inductees the same standards we apply to pre-inductees, the amnesty we support is not inclusive enough to serve this purpose of national reconciliation.

MINUTES - ACLU BOARD OF DIRECTORS - MAY 17, 1972 - CALLED MEETING TO DISCUSS REFERENDUM ON SUBSTITUTING "EXPRESSION ACTION" THEORY OF THE 1st AMENDMENT FOR THE "CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER" POLICY

Members present: Jon Johnston, Patsy Morris, John Glustrom, Gene Bianchi, Margie Hames, Emory Via, Jerry Cohen, Al Horn, Ruste Kitfield, Anne McNay, Leon Eplan. Guests: Charles Morgan, Clinton Deveaux, Gene Guerrero.

Meeting was called to order at 12:20 pm by Jon Johnston.

HIGHWAYS

Ruste Kitfield announced that the Atlanta Coalition On The Transportation Crisis has requested that the ACLU-Ga. assist their efforts and join their coalition of civic groups concerned with stopping the unrestricted construction of highways and tollways in Metro Atlanta.

Jon Johnston explained that at this point the coalition was simply asking the ACLU-Ga. to lend its name to their efforts. There are, he explained, potential civil liberties issues involved in this area.

Al Horn moved that the ACLU-Ga. associate itself with the coalition as long as there are no substantial costs, reserving any decisions on any further involvement. Seconded, motion passed unanimously. Jon Jojnston instructed the ACLU-Ga. office to write Maxine Rock of the coalition informing them of the decision , expressing the Board's thanks for the invitation.

ANNUAL MEETING

Ruste Kitfield reviewed the plans for the May 31st annual meeting. There will be a cash bar at 5:30 pm with the annual meeting following at 6:30 pm in the courtyard of the Midnight Sun restaurant. At 7:30 pm friends of Chuck Morgan are sponsoring a banquet in Morgan's honor.

ATLANTA SCHOOL CASE

Ruste Kitfield reviewed recent efforts to raise funds for the school case. The ACLU Foundation sent a fundraising mailing to 1,000 persons on the ACLU-Ga. mailing list on May 15. The Methodist Women, contacted by Winifred Green of the AFSC, have donated $1,000 and may give $4,000 more. $1,000 has been pledged by an anonomous donor. Attorney Morris Abram has been contacted. She and Jon Johnston met with Bea Rich Wolfe who's sympathetic and may have some funds available.

Jon Johnston asked the Board for guidance in the approach to possible donors explaining that he had indicated to Ms. Wolfe that $15,000 was needed by the Foundation to secure the services of an attorney for a two year period. John Glustrom asked if a big grant was secured whether all should go to the school case or whether part should go to other important areas. Jerry Cohen suggested informing prospective donors that the ACLU had several lawyers available for the case and that funds would be used for their services, court costs, and misc. expenses. Jon Johnston indicated that the main problem was developing an approach which would maximize the ways funds secured could be used.

Al Horn suggested that in light of the departure of the NAACP from the Black Coalition, that the NAACP might now be willing to take over part of the case. Ruste Kitfield said time was growing short, that action had to be taken now. Margie Hames said that the case had to be filed by June 15.

Jon Johnston asked what the case would cost. Margie Hames said it was very hard to estimate. $20,000 would be a good guess. John Glustrom asked what the minimum amount is that the ACLU would need to have in hand to initiate the case. Margie Hames said at least $5,000. Jerry Cohen said this was probably a low estimate. Cohen announced that the Lawyer's Committee for Civil Rights Under the Law is on record supporting the ACLU in the case and has several volunteer lawyers available.

John Glustrom moved that a 25% limit be placed on general ACLU-Ga. funds that could be used for the school case. Motion died for lack of a second. Glustrom moved that the Board send Ruste Kitfield to New York to raise money for the school case and for general funds for the foundation. Seconded, motion passed unanimously .

Al Horn suggested that Ruste talk to the NAACP while she is in New York. Gene Bianchi suggested that written materials be prepared for the trip. Jon Johnston will call on Bianchi to assist the committee advising Margie Hames on the school case.

REFERENDUM

Chuck Morgan explained his feelings on what the ACLU's position should be regarding the 1st Amendment - no position other that the Constitution's,"Congress shall make no law...." Al Horn asked him how he would vote on the referendum. Morgan explained that he would oppose the Board's action with qualifications.

Anne McNay suggested that the Board write the National Board explaining the ACLU-Ga's position on the question. The following statement was adopted unanimously and will be sent to national with the ballots: "The sense of the Board of Directors of the ACLU of Georgia is that the test should be the simple words of the first amendment with an 'absolutist' interpretation rather than as phrased in either of the questions posed for vote."

Meeting was adjourned at 1:30 pm.

CALL SYLVIA F. GRUGETT / PUBLIC INFORMATION CONSULTANT (212) JUdson 6-5690

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

New York. May 7 -- A national conference on corporal punishment in public schools today voted to urge the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare to limit its funds to those school districts in which corporal punishment is prohibited either by Board rule or by State law.

"All school districts applying for or now receiving funds should receive notice immediately that they must institute rules to abolish corporal punishment to qualify for further funding," the resolution stated.

This action was taken by the first national conference to combat corporal punishment in public schools which was attended by 85 representatives of 62 national organizations. The 3-day conference was sponsored by the American Civil Liberties Union and the American Orthopsychiatric Association.

The conference prepared an action program directed toward ending corporal punishment through litigation, legislation and the promotion of educational alternatives, according to Alan Reitman, associate executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union.

"This program, involving a wide variety of organizations, will be focused on local communities where the issue of protecting student rights must be pressed," Mr. Reitman said.

The plenary session defined corporal punishment as embodying both physical and psychological assault on any school child. The conference agreed that corporal punishment is deliberately used on children who are members of minority groups "as acts of overt racism."

Dr. Marion F. Langer, executive director of the American Orthopsychiatric Association, noted that the conference recommended that federal, state and local statutes should be employed to criminally prosecute school personnel who use paddles or sticks or practice "psychological terror" on school children.

A temporary steering committee was elected by the conference to: (1) develop plans for a national clearinghouse for information on the incidence of corporal punishment; (2) establish a legal "brief bank" to be used by lawyers bringing suits in the courts on corporal punishment cases; (3) convene an all-student conference to develop ways of combating corporal punishment -- since they are its victims; and (4) raise funds for this program.

Members of the steering committee include: Dr. Arthur Thomas, director, Student Rights Center, Dayton, Ohio; Nat Hentoff, writer, N.Y.; Alan Reitman, ACLU, N.Y.; Dr. Marion F. Langer, AOA, N.Y.; Dorothy Cotton, Southern Christian Leadership Conference, Atlanta, Ga.; Ronald Brown, Urban League, N.Y.; Shirley Lacy, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Inc. Fund, N.Y.; Adah Maurer, school psychologist, San Francisco, Cal.; Julian Hudson, teacher, Charlottesville, Va. and chairman of the NEA Task Force on Corporal Punishment; Carole Duncan, housewife and leader of Citizens Against Physical Punishment, Dallas, Texas; David Almada, teacher, Monterey Park, Cal.

Student members of the steering committee include: Debbie Bock, Wayne, Pa.; Richard Sussman, Lancaster, Pa.; Richard Gergel, Columbia, S.C.; Kurt Gripenstraw, Student NEA; Barbara Fleming, Columbia, S.C.; Bennie Eakes, Antioch College student; Gloria Cruz, Student NEA, Albuquerque, N.M.; Marge Logisz, Future Teachers of America intern, Washington, D.C.

Additional organizations represented at the conference include: National School Boards Association, National Education Association, Association for Supervisory and Curriculum Development, South Carolina Study on Student Involvement, American Association of School Administrators, National Association of Secondary School Principles, Jewish Board of Guardians, American Friends Service Committee, National Association for Retarded Children, American Academy of Child Psychiatry, Center for Law and Education.

The conference requested that ACLU local affiliates publicize incidents involving corporal punishment on the local level and initiate law suits challenging the practice.

Corporal Punishment Ban in Schools Sought

By GENE I. MAEROFF

Spearheaded by lawsuits, quiet but determined campaigns are starting to build up in various parts of the country to ban corporal punishment in the schools, a practice that only two states have declared illegal.

The drive to eliminate corporal punishment—the use of physical force, such as paddling or spanking, to discipline school children—is expected to gain momentum as the result of a three-day conference that ended here yesterday. Leaders felt they laid the groundwork for pulling their disparate efforts together into a national movement.

New Jersey and Massachusetts are the two states that have outlawed corporal punishment. The New York City Board of Education has banned it, but no statewide action has been taken.

At the conference here, 85 delegates from 50 agencies and organizations met under the sponsorship of the American Civil Liberties Union and the American Orthopsychiatric Association. The delegates agreed to form a committee to fight corporal punishment and to create a national clearinghouse for information on the subject.

Separate lawsuits challenging corporal punishment as a violation of civil rights are waiting to be heard in Federal courts in Vermont, Alabama, Florida, Texas, New Mexico, Pennsylvania, and California.

The Texas case, Ware v. Estes, a class action by a group of parents and children who lost in a lower court, will be heard Wednesday in Dallas by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

Most states have no statutes either authorizing or banning corporal punishment, leaving the matter to local discretion. At least 13 states—Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Hawaii, Michigan, Montana, Nevada, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Vermont and Virginia—have statutes condoning corporal punishment, according to a survey by the American Civil Liberties Union.

Though conference leaders could offer no statistics on the frequency of the use of corporal punishment, they described numerous incidents in school districts across the United States in wrich pupils, primarily on the elementary level, were said to have been beaten by teachers and supervisors with hands, paddles and rattans.

Among the alleged incidents were those involving a high school boy in Dallas who was beaten with a tennis shoe by his swimming coach for being late to practice; a fifth grade girl in St. Louis who was grabbed by her teacher and hit on the head with a ruler for being disorderly; a junior high school boy in Los Angeles who was paddled on the buttocks for being involved in a fight in which he said he was the victim, and a sixth grade boy in Hardwick, Vt., who was whipped with a 40-inch canvas belt for passing a note with a four-letter word to a girl classmate.

In a recent report on corporal punishment, the A.C.L.U. condemned such practices on the ground that they did physical and psychological damage to children.

Some educators, however, have defended corporal punishment as being a legitimate disciplinary method, when judiciously applied. Moreover, there is a feeling among some school personnel that they are being harassed when they are held accountable for using corporal punishment.

In a survey conducted in 1969 by the National Education Association, 65 per cent of the elementary school teachers and 55 per cent of the secondary teachers said they favored "judicious use" of violent bodily punishment.

The N.E.A., the country's largest organization for school personnel, has a task force currently investigating the use of corporal punishment. In the report it is scheduled to submit next month the task force is expected to recommend the practice's elimination.

"The situation throughout the United States is much worse than I thought," said Edward Wright, a member of the task force who was interviewed at the conference.

Phase-Out Voted

"I thought it would be a simple matter of the N.E.A.'s advocating an end to corporal punishment and the schools would listen," he added. "But I can tell now that it isn't going to be done away with that easily."

Mr. Wright is the assistant superintendent for instruction of the Owensboro, Ky. school system, where paddling is permitted, he said, when it is administered in the principal's office.

"I was naive when I got into this four years ago," said Mrs. Carolyn Schumacher of the Pittsburgh Committee to Abolish Corporal Punishment, another person interviewed at the conference. She continued:

"I thought it would be simple to get support, but I ran into fierce hostility from teachers and principals. Also, there are parents who want the school to have the right to spank their children."

Ultimately, Mrs. Schumacher's group prevailed and Pittsburgh's board of education voted to phase out corporal punishment, beginning with the kindergarten through the third grade. It is now outlawed through the fifth grade, though Mrs. Schumacher contends that teachers are trying to get the ban rescinded and that corporal punishment is still being applied, illegally, in the lower grades.

One of the issues subject to heated debate during the conference, held at the Belmont Plaza Hotel, was whether the participants should limit their attention to physical punishment or also include the matter of "psychological punishment" in their deliberations and recommendations.

Black delegates such as David Jacobs and Clarence Wright stated on several occasions throughout the weekend that the "threat facing black youngsters" in their region of the country "is not so much that they will get hit, but that they will be suspended or expelled."

Mr. Jacobs is with the American Friends Service Committee in Montgomery and Mr. Wright is with the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta.

At its plenary session yesterday afternoon, despite warnings from some white delegates that the move would "diffuse its efforts," the conference voted to define as corporal punishment "all forms of bodily and psychological attacks on students."

As an immediate step, the conference voted to ask the Federal Government to withhold education funds from local school districts or states that did not ban corporal punishment.

Some discussions during the three days of meetings turned to the question of "alternatives" for teachers who are being told not to use corporal punishment.

Among the suggestions were quiet rooms in which teachers and students could go to regain emotional composure, classroom assistants to absorb some of the tension, better preparation in teacher training to deal with confrontations, and scheduling of activity periods for students after long periods of concentration.

Atlanta, Georgia

Dear Jon:

I was astounded when I received my ballot for 1972 Officers and Directors of the ACLU of Georgia to find that not only was I being asked to vote Soviet-style, yes or no, but that I had no secret ballot, and no opportunity to nominate additional persons. If any other organization did this, I feel certain the ACLU would be first to defend the rights of the affected members.

It just happens that I don't want to vote for all of the proposed Officers and Directors, so that I am casting my vote, as required, against all!

Farewell to a Fighter

By Phil Garner

IF you're a Southerner and you want to be yourself, Atlanta is the place to do it, Charles Morgan Jr. said as he made ready to leave the city for a new job and new challenge in Washington, D.C.

Morgan should know. He left another major Southern city, Birmingham, in 1966 when he felt he could no longer live with reaction there to his stand against racial bigotry. He spent one year in Virginia, then came to Atlanta as head of the Southern Regional office of the American Civil Liberties Union, a job created expressly for him.

Since that time Morgan and a succession of young and tireless lawyers working for him have kept a critical eye on the course of Southern justice, and have represented major figures in the black civil rights movement as well as others with minority viewpoints.

Morgan's job was to organize ACLU affiliates in the South as well as to practice civil liberties law. When he opened the Atlanta office there were two ACLU affiliates in the South. Now the ACLU has active offices in every Southern state. ACLU Membership in the South has grown from 2,000 in 1964 to 20,000.

While he was practicing law and building membership, Morgan also was raising funds and speaking throughout the country on behalf of ACLU.

The style of the office under Morgan was frantic. When a case or a cause emerged and Morgan adjudged it worthy of the attention of his office, it was, more often than not, late in the course of events. It was part of the Morgan style to announce to his staff late one afternoon that an involved brief must be ready by eight o'clock the next morning. In such cases, the entire staff remained at its post until the job was done, sometimes working until 5 a.m.

Even though it was generally agreed that much of the rush nature of the work could have been avoided had a more conventional mind been behind the planning, the Morgan staff attacked its work with the zeal of people with a cause they believe in. Morgan's office, a volunteer ACLU attorney once commented, was "the most disorganized area I've seen since World War II."

AN equally distinguishing characteristic of the office under Morgan was its use as an information center and after-work gathering place by a variety of people ranging from lawyers and clients to journalists and politicians. It was friendly territory for many a citizen who felt most of the rest of the world was a no-man's land.

Morgan professed a deep love for the South and its people and asserts flatly, "The South runs the nation."

"The American struggle will be won or lost on an old and familiar battleground," he wrote in characteristically dramatic style in a report in 1969, "the Old Confederacy in a now-110-year-old guerilla war."

The Chuck Morgan making ready to leave the South for a new battleground has not changed his mind about the continuing struggle here.

But the man whose first love was Southern politics is eager to take on a political challenge near the seat of the nation's power.

Morgan's new ACLU job, like the one he left behind, was created for him. He is now called the National Legislative Director.

His job will be mainly to see that ACLU's members are informed about what's happening in Congress.

"People don't really understand," said Morgan, "that ACLU is not just an organization where everybody sits around swattin' flies.... We've got a quarter million membership and 83 percent of them are college graduates. Forty percent of the others have three years of college or more. The largest percentage of membership is in the 20-to-29-year-old range and the majority of our members are under the age of 39. The average contribution is more than $20 a head. We're organized in every state. We have more influence than most groups and our members ought to be organized on a congressional district basis. While we won't be in the political arena directly, we'll be letting folks know how their congressmen vote."

Morgan plans to organize membership rolls by congressional districts and to use a computer to match information with people.

"Hopefully, every member in a congressional district will know within 48 hours the actual testimony given before Congress or the position taken," Morgan said.

BUT Morgan is no mere distributor of voting records.

"I think the ACLU ought to get involved in some affirmative legislation," he said. "It seems to me the public schools ought to begin teaching something about the Bill of Rights. . .We ought to control the content instead of letting someone else control the content of those courses. There ought not be be a child who goes through a school system in the United States without learning what the Bill of Rights is."

Politics has been a Morgan forte, even though his racial views have been too radical to allow him to become an office seeker in the South himself. He still closely follows Alabama politics, for instance. Alabama Democratic Executive Committee Chairman Robert Vance once commented, "I wish Chuck would find a new hobby." A product of the University of Alabama, Morgan thrived in the political incubator of the campus. The University of Alabama until recently had the only accredited law school in the state. Young law students interested in politics cut their teeth on campus races, made their contacts with state politicians by working in campaigns and were ready to enter the (Continued on Page 22) arena themselves after graduation. Morgan had slipped into that mainstream and probably would have stayed except for one little quirk of character—he did not believe in turning down a case merely because the prospective client's cause was unpopular.

Morgan began law practice shortly after the Brown vs. Board decision of the U. S. Supreme Court in 1954 and the implementation decision of 1955 in a city that was to become a focal point of the racial struggle in the South. He didn't go out looking for civil rights cases. He was making a comfortable living practicing corporate law.

HIS first civil rights case involved a client named Tommy Reeves, who had gone into a public park in Birmingham to pray following racial demonstrations. Reeves had been arrested. Seven law firms turned Reeves down before Morgan was approached. He took the case and Reeves was acquitted. "He was praying for the wrong thing, I guess," said Morgan. "In Bull Connor's infinite wisdom that was a sin." After that came the case of a minister named Robert Hughes, head of the Alabama Community Relations Service, who declined to give a grand jury the names of his members. When word spread that a competent lawyer in Birmingham was willing to handle civil rights cases, Morgan had all of them he could handle. Harrison Salisbury of the New York Times came through Birmingham about then and wrote a series of reports on the city that got him indicted by a Birmingham grand jury on 42 counts of criminal libel. Morgan defended him. The cases kept coming. And then in Birmingham someone bombed a Negro church, killing four little girls attending Sunday School.

Morgan denounced the bombing in a speech to a young men's club and was subjected to threats and ostracism.

"I thought that whatever career I had in Birmingham was over," he said. "I didn't think I would really like to raise a son there."

He left Birmingham wrote a book about his experiences and worked in Virginia for a year before he was hired to open the ACLU's Southern office in Atlanta.

"Atlanta became a city that could meet change," said Morgan, comparing the two major environments of his life. "It's a city where you can be yourself. In Birmingham, you can't do that. . . . You just can't help but look at Atlanta and say that it has turned itself into the center of the rational South."

Rational though it was, Atlanta became a base for an eight-year Morgan crusade against the oppression of individual liberties. The thrust of that fight was racial.

Morgan was attorney in Reynolds vs. Sims, the reapportionment case requiring one-man, one-vote representation in both houses of state legislatures.

He represented two Negro plaintiffs who integrated the Huntsville, Ala., campus of the University of Alabama while Gov. George Wallace was standing in the door at the main campus in Tuscaloosa.

MORGAN was attorney in White vs. Crook, a case integrating juries in Lowndes County, Ala., and remains involved in jury integration cases throughout the South. He argued Whitus vs. Georgia before the U. S. Supreme Court, a case in which racially segregated juries selected from racially segregated tax rolls were declared unconstitutional. Morgan argued Lee vs. Washington before the Supreme Court and obtained what may be the broadest desegregation order ever entered, integrating the facilities of hundreds of penal institutions. In Hadnott vs. Amos, which he argued before the Supreme Court, Morgan obtained a place on the ballot in 1968 for nominees of the National Democratic Party of Alabama (NDPA), a predominantly black party claiming it was more loyal to the national party than the state democratic organization. As a result, 17 NDPA candidates were elected in Alabama. When six of the NDPA candidates were left off the ballot in Greene County, Ala., Morgan went back to the Supreme Court and got an order for a new election with the six NDPA candidates on the ballot. The six candidates were elected.

Morgan also has involved himself in cases concerned with women's rights and anti-war actions. Among his most famous clients have been Muhammad Ali, court-martialed Army Capt. Howard Levy, Green Beret Capt. John J. McCarthy, Lt. Col. Anthony B. Herbert and Georgia Rep. Julian Bond.

Morgan plans to retain a corner in the ACLU office in Atlanta, a result of his attachment to his native region. That attachment extends as well, he says, to the people of this region, most of whom do not agree with him philosophically.

"I never used the word 'nigger,' " Morgan said. "It took me a little longer to learn not to use the term 'redneck.' The only reason a man's neck is red is that he works hard. I'm one of the biggest rednecks I know of."

Morgan speaks out now, in fact, on a turn of events he calls the "new paternalism."

"The new paternalism says that if a black person says it, it must be true," said Morgan. "If he says it loud and says that he's a militant, then he must be a militant. It says 'I'm guilty, therefore if the black person says it, it must be true.'

"A black man's got a right to be a damned fool just like anybody else does, and he's got a constitutional right to be told he is. I see folks talking about cultural and racial pride. Well, I don't see anything in racial pride. I was born white and I'm not ashamed of it. I didn't have any control over that and the black person didn't either. Race is just a fact, it's not an extolling virtue."

Morgan leaves the South with the implication that he will certainly return.

"Race remains for me the most important question," said Morgan. "The war came and now we have the war cases. It wasn't the fact that we couldn't afford to fight and still have social progress, it was the fact that war takes your mind off social progress. The creative efforts went to the war. They went to one side in demonstrations and the other in warfare.

"But the central theme is still the South, and the central theme of Southern politics is still the question of blacks and white. The struggle in the South is a struggle of law against the order, not of law and order."

HIS friends staged a farewell party for Morgan. Associates made speeches and one even sang a couple of Morgan's favorite songs.

He was to have gone to his new job July 1, but he was, well, too busy. He would get there eventually but probably not until after the Democratic convention in Miami.

On July 1, Morgan was arguing for the seating of a challenge Mississippi delegation before the Democratic credentials committee in Washington.

Interrupted briefly by a bomb threat that cleared the hall, Morgan returned to win a unanimous vote of the committee for seating of the challenge delegation, led by Aaron Henry.

Henry rushed up and embraced Morgan before the entire audience.

"They say the race issue is passe," said Morgan. "Well, maybe it is, but the satisfaction was as strong as ever."

Then Morgan made plans to represent the Henry delegation through federal appeals court if necessary.

"I'll get to Washington," he said. "There'll just be a small delay."

Morgan Gets ACLU Legislative Post

Charles Morgan Jr., director of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) Southern regional office, has been named national legislative director for the ACLU in Washington.

Morgan came to Atlanta in 1963 from Birmingham, Ala., where he was instrumental in many civil liberties and civil rights causes. Morgan represented black students who sought admission to the University of Alabama despite Gov. George Wallace's schoolhouse door stand, and was also attorney for the union in the case of Lee vs. Washington which resulted in the desegregation of Alabama's penal institutions.

He has also defended former world heavyweight champion Muhammad Ali, Green Beret Capt. John McCarthy and State Rep. Julian Bond when he was excluded from the Georgia legislatue.

FOLLOWING ANNUAL MEETING

At 7:30 you are invited to a farewell banquet for Charles Morgan, Jr., who will be leaving Atlanta and his post as director of the Southern Regional office for Washington, D.C. to become National Legislative Director of the ACLU.

The banquet is sponsored by his friends in Georgia who are really grievin' at his leavin'. It marks the end of an era.

Chuck Morgan arrived in Atlanta from Birmingham, Alabama after 1963, having come to national attention following a speech made on the day after the Birmingham church bombing in which four children were killed.

He has served as principal attorney in numerous civil rights and civil liberties cases, including Reynolds v. Sims, the reapportionment case requiring one-man, one-vote representation in both houses of state legislatures which he argued before the United States Supreme Court.

In the University of Alabama desegregation case, he represented the Negro plaintiffs who gained admission into the University of Alabama's Huntsville Center, despite Governor Wallace's "stand in the schoolhouse door" in Tuscaloosa. He has served as attorney in numerous cases seeking to integrate the structures of justice in the South. Among them is White v. Crook, resulting in the integration of Lowndes County, Alabama, juries. In this case the Alabama statute (then existing in South Carolina and Mississippi) which excluded all women from jury duty was declared unconstitutional. This was the first application of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to women's rights. He has served or is presently serving as counsel in more than a score of cases to integrate the jury systems of Deep South counties in Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, South Carolina, Tennessee and Virginia. In Whitus v. Georgia, which he argued before the Supreme Court of the United States, racially discriminatory juries selected from racially segregated tax digests were declared unconstitutional. This decision resulted in the setting aside of at least five Georgia death penalty convictions including that of Julious Sullivan whom he also represented before the Supreme Court of the United States in Sullivan v. Georgia, and whose conviction was reversed per curiam.

In Lee v. Washington which he argued before the Supreme Court of the United States he obtained what is probably the broadest desegregation order entered, literally hundreds of Alabama penal and correctional institutions being required to integrate their facilities. In this case the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment was said to cover the rights of Negro prisoners. He has served or is now serving as counsel in similar actions to integrate penal and correctional facilities and public employment in South Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, Mississippi and Louisiana.

In Morris v. Fortson, which he argued before the Supreme Court of the United States, he attempted to have Georgia's 1966 gubernatorial election declared invalid, but the Court ruled against his contentions

MINUTES - BOARD OF DIRECTORS, ACLU OF GEORGIA - FEBRUARY 1, 1973

Be it remembered that the Board of Directors of the American Civil Liberties Union of Georgia met on Thursday, February 1, 1973 at 88 Walton Street, N.W. President Jon Johnston called the meeting to order at 8:00 p.m. Members present were: Austin Ford, Lew Deadmore, Anne McNay, Bob Tuve, John Mulroy, Clinton Deveaux, Gene Guerrero, Emory Via, Jim Coogler, Patsy Morris, Mary Olive Thomas, Nat Gozansky, John Mather and Executive Director Ruste Kitfield.

ED LADD

Jon Johnston expressed the Board's deep regret at the death of Ed Ladd who was present at the last meeting. Emory Via moved the adoption of the following resolution,

"The American Civil Liberties Union of Georgia notes with grief the death of its first president, Dr. Edward T. Ladd. Ed Ladd and a small band of friends first organized the Union in Georgia and through his continued efforts as a member of the Board of Directors, Chairman of the Academic Freedom Committee, and member of the National Advisory Committee, he helped the Union to grow and prosper.

"Ed Ladd cared for freedom, cared for it and worked for it. His was an expansive and liberal view of freedom, insisting that the Bill of Rights applies where few had thought of applying it. For it was to children that he devoted himself both personally and professionally.

"His views were thoughtful, well considered; his judgement solid, and we counted on it. A compassionate and serious thinker, a man of gaiety and ready wit, Ed Ladd set an example of what it is to be a citizen in a democracy and a friend.

"We offer our sincere sympathy to his family. His friends and co-workers in the American Civil Liberties Union of Georgia are as dimished by his death as they were enriched by his life."

Bob Tuve seconded the motion. Passed unanimously. A copy of the resolution will be sent to his family, the Department of Education at Emory and the National Committee Against Corporal Punishment.

Jon Johnston asked for suggestions as to actions the ACLU of Ga. might take to honor Ed Ladd. Among the suggestions were: giving a posthumous award at the next Bill of Rights dinner, renaming the ACLU of Ga. Foundation, donating books to the Emory library in his name. There was a consensus that the work of the academic freedom committee should continue and that information on student's rights should be developed and dissiminated in Ed Ladd's name. Anne McNay moved that Roger Feldman be invited to suceed Ed Ladd as head of the Academic Freedom committee. Austin Ford seconded the motion which was approved unanimously. The secretary of the Board will send an invitation to Feldman.

ABORTION CASE

Anne McNay moved the adoption of the following resolution: "Whereas Margie Pitts Hames sucessfully pursued the case of Doe v. Bolton in the Supreme Court of the United States with great sacrifice of time, thought, and talent.

Be it resolved; The Board of Directors of the American Civil Liberties Union of Georgia extends its congradulation and appreciation to Ms. Hames, and expresses on behalf of our citizens its gratitude for this signal victory for the rights of women."

Jim Coogler seconded the motion which was approved unanimously and will be sent to Ms. Hames.

JOB DESCRIPTION - EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

Jon Johnston read the report of the ad hoc committee which prepared a job description. There was discussion of the relationship of the Director and the Board as discussed in items 5,7, and 9. Should responsibility for membership promotion, fundraising and the annual meeting rest with the Director or the Board. Nat Gozansky moved that the phrase "be responsible" in those three items be changed to "be responsible under the direction and with the cooperation of the Board of Directors." Emory Via seconded the motion which passed unanimously.

Emory Via moved that an item be added to read, "Prepare an annual report on the activities and status of the Union." Gene Guerrero seconded the motion. Mary Olive Thomas suggested adding the clause to item two. Her suggestion was accepted as a friendly amendment and the motion passed unanimously.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Jon Johnston announced that the invitations to serve as members of the Advisory Committee had not been made because of the press of other Union business.

REVENUE SHARING

Ruste Kitfield reported on the press conference the Union held announcing that the ACLU will sue the City of Atlanta if the Aldermen approve a scheme to rebate revenue sharing income to property owners or water department users. Jerry Cohen will be the lead attorney.

NOMINATING COMMITTEE

Jon Johnston opened nominations for members of the nominating committee, to consist of three board members and four non-board ACLU members. John Mulroy, Bob Tuve and Clinton Deveaux were nominated for the board positions and Ruste Kitfield, Helen Bullard, Eleanor Richardson and David Colmer were nominated for the at-large positions with Noyes Collinson to serve as alternate if someone could not accept. The nominations were approved unanimously.

CONSIDERATION OF APPLICANTS FOR DIRECTOR

The Board went into executive session with Ruste Kitfield, Anne McNay and Gene Guerrero leaving the room. Clinton Deveaux served as acting secretary. Jon Johnston reported that six applicants have submitted resumes and a seventh resume was received on February 1. Nat Gozansky moved to close nominations. Approved unanimously. John Mather suggested that the ad hoc committee which has been interviewing applicants complete the remaining four interviews and make a reccomendation to the Board. Nat Gozansky suggested that instead of one reccomendation, the committee reccomend those whom it feels are most qualified, one if possible but two or three if necessary. Discussion ensued. Emory Via moved that the committee be established to complete interviewing and make a report to the Board. The motion passed with one objection. Clinton Deveaux expressed strong concern with the contravening of the purpose of the Board as expressed at the last meeting that a selection would be made at the Feb. 1st meeting. Further discussion. General consensus was that the committee should screen the candidates as much as possible and arrive with a recommendation or recommendations. Bob Tuve moved the consensus and Nat Gozansky seconded. Passed unanimously. Nat Gozansky moved that the committee report to the Board on Tuesday, February 13 and that in accordance with the by-laws, there be no votes by proxy. The motion passed. (The interpretation of the by-laws by the President was such that the issue of the election was not before the Board at this Feb. 1st meeting.) NOTE: No proxies will be accepted at the February 13th meeting.

WOMEN IN THE ACLU

Gene Guerrero reported that the Board at its last meeting had acted on incorrect information in discussing the recommendations of the ad hoc committee. Those recommendations were ad hoc and did not reflect a position of the National Board. Later the Special Board Committee On The Role Of Women In The ACLU had issued a series of recommendations which affiliates are asked to respond to. Guerero read the recommendations which were adopted unanimously with two reservations. The amending of the ACLU Constitution to provide six additional at-large members of the National Board (to increase the participation of women) should be seen as temporary with every effort made to reduce the size of the national board back to its orginal size as soon as possible. The seventh recommendation should be clarified as to the responsibility and authority of the national board as distinguished from the Women's Rights Steering Committee in such a way that responsibility clearly rests with the Board. Furthermore the proposals of item seven should be stated in such a way as to clearly indicate the autonomy of affiliates.

The meeting was adjourned at 10:15 P.M.

Respectfully Submitted,

Part of our lower renewal rate for the first third of this year is because some members renewed early in response to last fall's "emergency" mailing. But rate of renewal is one of our weaknesses. An analysis of the 1973 renewal campaign (Dec.-April) compared with the 1972 campaign reveals that our renewal rate is only up 4%. Our rate is behind all other Southern states (most in the 10%-20% range) except South Carolina and Texas. We are also weak in terms of new members that we solicit (affiliate new). Dear Friend,

You don't have to be a lawyer to join the American Civil Liberties Union. All you need is to care about freedom. Freedom cannot be taken for granted, it will not come as a gift from power, but is a possession to be earned daily by the concerted efforts of each of us.

Since 1965, the ACLU of Georgia has worked diligently to preserve and extend the rights of all citizens. Every month we receive hundreds of calls for help. Sometimes we can right wrongs without going to court. Other times legal action results, but sometimes we cannot respond.

With your help, with your membership and commitment, we can respond to more and more of those who need our help. When funds for public legal assistance have been drastically cut and when individuals in the highest levels of government conspire to deny individuals their rights, it is imperative that the American Civil Liberties Union maintain its strength and independence.

The ACLU of Georgia just won a landmark decision in the United States Supreme Court, establishing the right of a woman to have an abortion. And you probably read about our recent victory in the Atlanta Revenue Sharing case in which citizens interests were protected against the illegal use of funds by the City. These cases are famous, but most are not; they simply allow individuals to exercise their rights.

We are committed to the Bill of Rights:

Your right to know and to speak

Your right to worship as you please

Your right to equal protection of the laws

We know that you care, too. When you make a commitment to join and help, we make a commitment to work for you, inform you, and defend you personally, if need be, if your rights are abridged. If the rights of one person can be denied, the rights of all are in danger. This is the principle which guides our belief and our action.

Won't you invest in your rights now? Join the ACLU of Georgia.We need your help, and many people need ours.

We are enclosing a membership envelope and an invitation to attend our annual meeting on June 2. Join us.

Sincerely,

Gene Guerrero Jon Johnston

CASES IN COURT

(1) Armour v. Nix - Atlanta school case. Supreme Court issued a 4-4 "no decision" on the Richmond, Virginia case. ACLU case should now be heard by the District Court here. We will also file an objection to the "compromise plan" with the Fifth Circuit in New Orleans. Cooperating attorney is Margie Hames.

(2) Reasor v. Butts County Schools - Case closed after school board rescinded policy of requiring female students who marry to drop out of school until the following year. Cooperating attorney was Charles Marchman of Macon.

(3) Sapp v. Renfroe - Compulsory ROTC at Decatur High School. On May 15 Judge Moye ruled that in view of the relaxing standards of society and the increased permisiveness, a little military training was beneficial. Cooperating attorney Elizabeth Rindskopf will appeal. Appeal costs should be less than $200 as she does not plan to print her brief.

(4) City of Atlanta v. Thomas Pickens - Young black man arrested on traffic charges in Decatur and beaten after protesting being fingerprinted. David Crosland took the assault charges as a private case after Pickens indicated that he had put up some resistance to. $200 fine.

(5) Community Action Group v. City of Columbus - unfavorable ruling from Fifth Circuit. Petition has been filed to reconsider and consider the case en banc. A petition for certiorari has been filed at the Supreme Court of Georgia on the contempt charges arising from the case. Cooperating attorneys are Margie Hames and Al Horn.

(6) A.J. Burnham, Et Al. v. The Dept. of Public Health - unfavorable ruling at the District Court. Currently on appeal to the Fifth Circuit in conjunction with the Alabama mental health suit. Attorney Jack Drake of Tuscaloosa is handling both appeals. Cooperating attorney is Tom Harper.

(7) City of Atlanta v. Robert Dixon - student at the Downtown Learning Center was arrested in front of Rich's during the strike while trying to transfer buses to go to school. Charged with obstruction of officers. Charges dismissed at police court. Cooperating attorney Joe Bankoff has asked the police department to destroy arrest records. Awaiting reply from Inman.

5/29/73

POSSIBLE CASES

(1) Macon Juvenile Court - the court is trying to take five kids under 16 away from a widower solely on the grounds that she is a homosexual. Cooperating attorney is Charles Marchman.

(2) Union Democracy - a black phone company employee is being expelled from the union because she helped distribute a black workers newsletter containing an article critical of the union. Cooperating attorney is Mary Joyce Johnson.

(3) Juror Qualifications - the questionaire for jury duty contains a list of legal grounds for exclusion including "housewife with children 14 years of age or younger" and "female". No cooperating attorney as yet.

(4) Student Activity Funds - last year the Student Gov't Assoc. and the Regents got into a dispute over allocation of student activity funds at the Univ. of Ga. In the past the SGA has allocated the funds, last year the Regents stepped in and changed allocations. SGA has requested that we take the case. We are awaiting the result of legal research by a class at the law school and possible Athens attorneys to take the case.

(5) Retardation Center - black head of a cottage at the center was fired after he protested the transfer of a young black patient to Milledgeville. The cottage head argued that the treatment the patient received was an imposition of white culture on a black person. That could be a main issue of the case along with the question of due process and free speech in the firing. Cooperating attorney is Ralph Martin.

Middle class or white - non-Institutional ?

(6) Airport - salesmen for radical and underground newspapers have been barred from the airport. New distribution is exclusively handled by a news agency that will not handle the papers. Cooperating attorney is Rick Middleton.

(7) City Elections - engineering aide for the City of Atlanta wants to run for City Council. New City Charter reads under qualifications, "Must not hold or qualify for any other elective public office, or hold any position of full-time employment with the State of Georgia, any county thereof, or with the city." No cooperating attorney as yet.

(8)Atlanta Penitentiary - black inmate is being denied permission to marry a white woman. Denial appears completely arbitrary. Cooperating attorney is Mary Joyce Johnson.

(9) Aliens - one resident alien was barred from teaching in the Governor's Honors program. Another has been barred from a job with a county health department. State policy is that aliens cannot have a job unless it is demonstrated that no U.S. citizens are available. Cooperating attorney is Carter Tate.

MINUTES: Executive Committee, ACLU of Georgia - July 18, 1973

Present were: Margie Hames, Tom Almon, Gene Guerrero, Richard Fishman, Jeff Jacobson, Jerry Cohen, Jon Johnston, Patsy Morris.

A proposal was made to the Executive Committee concerning a State Revenue Sharing Case in which the ACLU of Georgia might be interested. Discussion centered on the similarities and differences between the Atlanta Revenue Sharing Case and this proposal; also there was considerable discussion about the pros and cons of having only a part of the suit won. The Executive Committee expressed interest in filing the suit if an attorney can be found. Jerry Cohen suggested the Jonathan Golden be asked if he would consider being the Attorney of Record. It was noted that Elliott Levitas was interested in the suit, but not in handling it. If the suit is filed, it was recommended that the ACLU hold a Press Conference to discuss the issues.

Gene reported that a complaint had been received that Emergency School Assistance Act (ESSA) monies were being approved by the Atlanta Board of Education for use in Roman Catholic schools. The monies are appropriated for remedial education for minorities. The schools to which the funds have been allocated have varying minority enrollments. Apparent Church-State issues are raised. Margie suggested that an ACLU committee go to the Board of Education and ask them to re-allocate the funds in view of Supreme Court decisions denying use of public funds for parochial education. It was suggested that Dr. Mays be called and asked for time at a future School Board briefing session so that the issues could be raised. The Committee is to consist of Gene, Margie and Jerry.

Gene presented a suggested "Procedure for Taking Cases" statement. After discussion and minor amendments, the attached statement was adopted.

Respectfully submitted,

Patsy Morris
Ascting Secretary

Procedure for Taking Cases

Requests for ACLU assistance by the state office will be screened for possible civil liberties violations by the Lawyers Committee of the Board of Directors. Cases originating in the geographic area of an active chapter will be forwarded to the respective Chapter Board, with comments from the Lawyers Committee, for consideration as a possible case.

Where a chapter does not exist or is not active, the Lawyers Committee will make recommendations to the Board of Directors, which will be presented to the Board by the head of the Lawyers Committee or the Executive Director.

All cases must be approved by the Board of Directors. Between Board Meetings, the Executive Committee of the Board is empowered to act on behalf of the full Board. In the event of an emergency situation, a majority of the Executive Committee are authorized to approve cases.

CHILDREN"S ADVOCACY PROJECT
ACLU FOUNDATION OF GEORGIA, INC.

I. THE JUVENILE JUSTICE PROBLEM

The American juvenile court system was launched in 1889, with an intended goal of promoting justice for juveniles by diverting them from the adult criminal justice system. Children were supposed to receive individualized treatment at the hands of the new courts. But, instead, the treatment of children by our judicial system has become steadily more arbitrary, less individualized and more callous since 1889. Justine Polier, former judge of the New York State Family Court, spoke for many critics when she questioned the continued social utility of our juvenile justice system, as follows:

> Many within the courts, as well as without, must question the extent to which the courts can play a constructive role in the lives of troubled children and their families in the absence of adequate services. To many critics these courts represent only one more bureaucratic institution through which children -- delinquent, incorrigible, emotionally disturbed, mentally ill -- can once more be put away and out of sight. It has been charged that juvenile courts use the rhetoric of rehabilitation and treatment while they place children in 'junior prisons' which have little to offer other than custodial containment.

Georgia's juvenile justice system, like those of most American jurisdictions, exists in an Alice in Wonderland air of unreality. It is a topsy-turvy world, in which children are denied constitutional rights, and are prosecuted and imprisoned for offenses which have no counterpart in the adult criminal justice system. In order to illustrate the hazards facing a child in Georgia's juvenile justice system, consider the case of Charles Doe, a fifteen year old black child, whose name is fictional, but whose true story is repeated every day in the juvenile courts of Georgia.

Charles was deserted by his parents shortly after he was born, and was raised by his aunt and his grandmother in Rural County, Goergia. The segregated school which Charles attended was characteristically poor so that when the county's schools were integrated, Charles found himself competing with children who had the advantage of years of superior schooling. Confused and defeated, Charles was often truant. Sometimes his anger and frustration culminated in fights between himself and white students. He was subjected to the discipline of white teachers and administrators.

The school authorites punished Charles by petitioning the juvenile court to declare him an "unruly child". They forced his aunt to swear out an unruly petition against Charles by threatening her with a $100 a day fine for every day Charles missed school under Georgia's strict compulsory education laws.

The charge of being an "unruly child" is called a "status offense", because the child is not charged with committing any criminal act, but is prosecuted and punished because of his ambiguous state of being. Neither the child nor his guardian is given notice as to what behavior constitutes unruliness. The law is applied differently from county to county and by judge to judge. Although the United States Supreme Court has held that similar adult status offenses, such as being an alcoholic or a drug addict, are unconstitutional, it has never ruled on the constitutionality of status offenses applicable only to children.

The judge told Charles that he had a right to an attorney, but did not offer to appoint one for him, although the law requires that he do so. But, possibly this judge was not familiar with that law. After all, Rural County, Georgia, unlike its urban neighbors, has no full-time juvenile judge, because Georgia has no uniform system of juvenile courts. The Rural County Superior Court judge, who has no special knowledge, training or expertise in juvenile law, sits once a month as juvenile judge. So it is easy to see how this judge might not have known that in 1967, the United States Supreme Court ruled, in the case of In Re Gault, 387 U.S. 1(1967), that children are entitled to the same rights to counsel as adults, including a court-appointed attorney. But Rural County has not fully implemented the Gault decision by providing either a public defender or appointed counsel for children. Charles and his aunt did not understand that they had a right to an attorney. Nor did they understand the necessity for an attorney, not could they afford one, so Charles, like many children before and after him, went unrepresented.

The judge ruled that Charles was an unruly child and placed him on probation. The conditions of his probation were that he attend school and church regularly. Rural County had no trained juvenile probation workers to work with Charles. Georgia has not implemented uniform statewide probation services. Without effective probation counseling, Charles quickly lapsed into his previous behavior patterns, and missed school and church regularly.

Charles was then arrested for violation of probation. He was incarcerated in the Rural County jail because the county has no separate juvenile detention facilities. The only method of separating Charles from adult prisoners was by use of solitary confinement. Charles was immediately suspended from school (prior to any hearing to determine his guilt or innocence). He was denied the right to bail, and, therefore, remained in solitary confinement in the county jail waiting for the once monthly session of the juvenile court.

The judge revoked Charles' probation, and his status as an unruly child, and ruled that he was now a delinquent child. Georgia law provides that any child once adjudicated unruly who disobeys a court order, can then be held as a delinquent. Unlike unruly children, a delinquent child may be sent to a state Youth Development Center without a prior finding that he or she is not amenable to alternative methods of treatment or rehabilitation. Rural County had no alternatives to incarceration anyway, so Charles was committed to a Youth Develoment Center two hundred miles away from his home and family, for an indeterminate sentence.

At the Youth Development Center, Charles was mixed with juveniles convicted of everything from theft and robbery to rape and murder. He was subjected to homosexual assaults. He was never given a psychiatric diagnostic interview or psychological counseling. The academic school at the Y.D.C. was worse than the segretated one Charles had attended in Rural County. Charles was denied access to the vocational training program at the Y.D.C., which was extremely limited anyway, because he was not yet sixteen. In fact, the only effective training which Charles received at the Y.D.C. was from his fellow inmates - in criminal skills.

When Charles was released from the Y.D.C., he found he could not get a good job or get into a decent school because the Rural County juvenile court and the Y.D.C. both regularly release their records to prospective employers, trade and technical schools, universities, law enforcement agencies and the armed forces. Effectively barred from pursuing any socially acceptable occupation, Charles was well on his was to a "career" in crime. After receiving the "individualized treatment" of Georgia's juvenile justice system, he was well equipped for a criminal career.

THE PROBLEM

The ACLU Foundation of Georgia is deeply concerned about Charles Doe and all the children who are harmed by the Juvenile Justice System of our state. We shall now describe some of the specific problems which children confront when they become entangled with the law.

I. JUVENILE COURTS ARE OVERCROWDED WITH CHILDREN WHO SHOULD NOT BE THERE IN THE FIRST PLACE.

One-third of the children processed through the juvenile justice system are detained for status offenses, and over eighty-five percent of the children detained in Georgia are held for reasons that would not warrant arresting an adult under similar circumstances. About ninety percent of the girls at the Atlanta Youth Development Center are committed for status offenses, and similar figures hold true for the girls at the Macon Youth Development Center. According to officials at the Macon Y.D.C., many girls are committed on unruly petitions taken out by their parents who are angered over the inter-racial dating of their daughters.

Another distinct group of children with which the court is unfortunately dealing are those who are emotionally disturbed or retarded. Georgia law provides for the committment of a child only if he or she is in need of treatment or rehabilitation. Children who are severely emotionally disturbed or retarded are supposed to receive a different treatment. Yet children are not entitled to a psychiatric diagnostic interview prior to disposition in Georgia juvenile courts. Thus, there is no way of telling whether the child's problem stems from severe emotional difficulties. Out of the 7,476 children processed by the Fulton County Juvenile Court in 1971, only three were sent to a State Mental Hospital, and none to a treatment facility for the mentally retarded. Children with mental illness are thus regularly denied their right to treatment in Georgia.

II. JUSTICE IS APPLIED UNEVENLY THROUGHOUT THE STATE.

The quality of juvenile justice in Georgia varies from county to county, court to court, and program to program. The Georgia Legislature enacted a new Juvenile Court Code in 1971, but it has not implemented a uniform statewide system of juvenile courts. Out of 159 counties, only five (Fulton, DeKalb, Cobb, Bibb and Ware) have separate juvenile courts with appointed full-time juvenile judges. The other 154 counties have part-time juvenile judges. The primary duties, interest and training of these judges are usually in other fields, and they cannot or will not devote the energy required to understand the children whom they must judge. Legislative proposals for such a statewide system have been defeated, due to the opposition by local politicians and part-time juvenile court judges.

The conditions of probation placed on children also vary from county to county in Georgia. In many counties probation is administered by trained personnel of a Court Services Unit of the State Department of Human Resources. But a child in a county with an independent juvenile system often has his or her probation administered by the county which, as in the case of Charles Doe, amounts to no probation services at all. The philosophy of some Georgia judges towards rehabilitation of children in trouble is open to some criticism. In Dougherty County (Albany), for example, children are placed on probation to the Judicial Service Agency where they receive "Emotional Maturity Instruction" from a booklet entitled "Wisdom From The Aramaic". Teenage probationers in Dougherty County periodically take the Minnesota Multiphasic Personality Inventory Test. Those who fail to improve their scores have been sent to a chiropractor for spinal realignment as a remedial measure.

The Supreme Court's Gault decision extended the due process rights to counsel and cross-examination to children. But there has been little implementation of the Gault decision in many rural counties, as illustrated by the case of Charles Doe. For example, if Charles had lived in Fulton or DeKalb counties, he would have been represented by a public defender or a court-appointed private attorney. Whether a child's rights will be protected, and the nature of punishment he or she will receive, has little to do with the offense, but depends on where the case is heard.

III. THE CONDITIONS IN MANY OF THE INSTITUTIONS TO WHICH JUVENILES ARE SENT BY THE COURTS ARE DEPLORABLE.

The State Department of Human Resources administers six short term regional Youth Development Centers, which house children detained by the courts prior to their trials, and four long term Youth Development Centers where children are committed by the juvenile courts. In addition, six counties have their own independent juvenile detention centers which also serve as holding facilities for surrounding counties. In December of 1972, the Presiding Juvenile Court Judges of Fulton and DeKalb Counties complained of overcrowding and homosexual attacks in their respective county detention centers. But in many counties, children are kept in the county jail, and often, as in the case of Charles Doe, are separated from adult prisoners only through the use of solitary confinement, if at all.

Treatment and education are practically non-existent at many of these facilities. Only one of the State's long term Youth Development Centers has a state-accredited academic program, despite an average stay at the centers of eight to nine months per child. The state's short term Regional Y.D.C.'s have a very limited academic program because children are rarely detained there for long periods of time. However, ACLU Foundation of Georgia cooperating attorneys are currently challenging the incarceration of a 15 year old boy for 14 months in the Augusta Regional Y.D.C. without a sufficient academic program. Psychiatric and psychological care is woefully inadequate at the state Youth Development Centers. Doctor to patient ratios often exceed one to 400.

The vocational training programs at the Youth Development Centers need to be strengthened. At the Macon Y.D.C., for example, the vocational program consists of instruction in business education (typing and office machine instruction), cosmotology, home economics, horticulture, food service and laundry. According to the Center's annual report, "... the laundry provides laundry services for the Macon Youth Development Center and also on-the-job training for those girls interested in this type of work."

IV. ONCE A CHILD IS RELEASED FROM THE COURT'S CUSTODY, HIS RECORDS HAUNT HIM THROUGHOUT HIS LIFE.

Children are often barred from technical schools and colleges because of their juvenile records which are regularly released by the Y.D.C.'s and the juvenile courts. Georgia law gives juvenile judges and administrators wide discretion to release records.

V. THERE IS A LACK OF ALTERNATIVES TO INCARCERATION FOR THE MANY CHILDREN WHO COULD BE BETTER SERVED IN OTHER FACILITIES AND PROGRAMS.

Effective alternatives to probation or commitment to a Youth Development Center are rare in Georgia. A variety of community based projects, including group homes, day centers, and intensive treatment centers, were instituted in 1972. But only 400 to 500 juveniles were treated in these projects in 1972; almost 6,000 children were committed to the Youth Development Centers. Georgia needs to develop more alternatives to incarceration. e.g.., halfway houses, group homes, foster homes, and youth service bureaus to handle the children now being shipped to the Y.D.C.'s.

THE CHILD ADVOCACY PROJECT

The American Civil Liberties Union Foundation of Georgia, Inc., proposes to attack the problem of Georgia's juvenile justice system with a Child Advocacy Project, utilizing a threefold plan of action: litigation, coordination, and education.

LITIGATION

The Child Advocacy Project will bring lawsuits in many of the following areas:

A. Right to Treatment

Primary attention will be given to developing new case law on children's right to treatment. Several courts have already held that involuntary civil confinement without treatment constitutes cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Specifically, the Child Advocacy Project will bring cases to establish the following rights:

1. Right to psychiatric diagnostic interview prior to the juvenile court's dispositional hearing;
2. Right to psychiatric care for severely disturbed and mentally retarded children detained by the juvenile courts;
3. Right to vocational training for all children in Y.D.C.'s, and not just those over fifteen years of age, as is the present practice;
4. Right to an accredited educational program for all detained children;
5. Right to decent living conditions at juvenile detention centers (primary attention directed towards the Bibb County Detention Home).

B. Due Process

In the area of children's due process rights, we will, of course, try to force all Georgia juvenile courts to implement fully the Gault decision, and we will also seek to expand due process rights in the juvenile courts in the following areas.

1. Status offenses: the Project feels that status offenses are ripe for constitutional challenge, and will direct primary attention towards that effort.
2. Conditions of probation: the Project will attack outrageous conditions of probation such as requiring children to receive religious instruction.

3. Solitary confinement - we will challenge the use of solitary confinement in juvenile detention centers.

4. Court records - we will seek to insure the privacy of juvenile court records.

5. School authorities - when necessary, the Project will sue to prevent abuses of discretion by school authorities, such as suspension prior to an adjudicative hearing in juvenile court, unconstitutional searches inside schools, and abuses of academic freedom.

6. Uniform juvenile courts - the Project will consider a suit to force the state to establish uniform, statewide juvenile court systems and procedures.

The above list of lawsuits is not meant to be exhaustive, but is merely suggestive of the type of litigation that the Project has in mind.

The American Civil Liberties Union Foundation of Georgia, Inc., is uniquely equipped to provide an effective statewide effort in this field. The American Civil Liberties Union of Georgia has chapters and cooperating attorneys in all parts of the state who are willing and able to aid this project. The Project's staff attorneys in Atlanta will direct the litigation efforts. Some of the major cases will be handled directly by these attorneys, but many cases will be channelled to cooperating attorneys. From this group of attorneys, we will form a Cooperating Attorneys Committee, whose members will handle various cases assigned to the Committee by the Project office. The staff attorneys will be available to give aid and direction to the cooperating attorneys. Attorneys for this Committee will be drawn not only from the existing list of ACLU of Georgia cooperating attorneys, but also from new sources as well. One such source is the Juvenile Law Section of the Georgia Bar Association's Younger Lawyers Section. In addition, Professor Lucy Henritze, of the Emory University Law School, has volunteered to organize the statewide graduates of her Clinical Juvenile Law program for service in the Child Advocacy Project. Committees of law students will be formed at the state's three major law schools: Emory in Atlanta, Mercer in Macon, and the University of Georgia in Athens. These law student committees will aid cooperating attorneys in the preparation of their cases, and do investigative work to lay the foundation for future litigation.

In addition to ACLU cooperating attorneys, the general lay membership of the ACLU of Georgia will take an active role in the Child Advocacy Project. Committees of ACLU of Georgia members will be formed to investigate conditions and programs of juvenile detention facilities all across the atate. Members will support Project litigation by doing research, compiling statistics and lining up expert witnesses. In addition, membership committees of the Project will play a major role in identifying problems and setting priorities for Project litigation. We have already received an incredibly enthusiastic response from our members who are interested in working with the Child Advocacy Project.

The Child Advocacy Project will also play an integral role in the National ACLU's Juvenile Justice Project, directed by Ms. Rena Uviller. The National Project has developed a nationwide network of lawyers and lay people who are knowledgeable about and active in the area of juvenile justice. The National Juvenile Justice Project has an active nationwide docket of about 65 cases, and Ms. Uviller assists ACLU lawyers throughout the country in preparing their cases. The National Project keeps in regular contact with ACLU affiliates in every state, alerting them to new developments in the field and monitoring their activities so that work is orchestrated and ideas shared. ACLU attorneys form the single most experienced and knowledgeable group of lawyers in the juvenile field in the United States, having argued such landmark juvenile cases as the previously mentioned In Re Gault, and In Re Winship, 397 U.S. 358(1970), which held that juveniles, like adults, were innocent until proven guilty by proof beyond a reasonable doubt.

The Child Advocacy Project will work in close alliance with the Georgia Chapter of the National Council on Crime and Delinquency (NCCD). The NCCD is organizing a statewide Task Force on Juvenile Delinquency which will conduct studies, research and investigation of the juvenile justice system in Georgia, and press for needed reforms. It will support our Child Advocacy Project by identifying problems susceptible to solution through lawsuits, researching these problems to lay a factual foundation for the lawsuit, and providing expert testimony at trial. Project attorneys will also work closely with attorneys for the Children's Defense Fund, whose work emphasizes legal issues in education. The Child Advocacy Project will work with other groups also, such as the National Council of Jewish Women, who do invaluable research in juvenile justice; The Bridge and The Link, organizations doing family and children counseling in Atlanta; and the Atlanta Street Academy, which provides storefront schools for dropouts and children from juvenile courts.

COORDINATION

The Project and the National Council on Crime and Delinquency Task Force will cooperate to coordinate services and agencies that aid children in Georgia. A primary goal of the NCCD and the ACLU Foundation of Georgia in this area is the formation of a Youth Services Bureau, which we define as follows:

> The Youth Service Bureau is an independent public delinquency prevention agency established to divert children and youth from the juvenile justice system by: (1) mobilizing community recources to solve youth problems; (2) strengthening existing youth resources and developing new ones; (3) promoting positive programs to remedy delinquency breeding conditions.

The Cooperative Youth Services System project of the Atlanta Public Schools is attempting to provide such a service for the City of Atlanta. The ACLU Foundation of Georgia is one of the cooperating agencies in their project. In addition to the City of Atlanta, the Child Advocacy Project will help the NCCD to develop a statewide central clearing house of information, ideas and services available to children with legal problems. Juvenile court workers will be given complete access to our resources to aid in their disposition of individual children. The clearing house will act as a link between the juvenile court and available community resources. No such service is available in Georgia today.

EDUCATION

The final function of the Child Advocacy Project will be to educate citizens as to the problems existent in Georgia's juvenile justice system, and to press for needed reforms. The Project's staff attorneys will conduct seminars for interested attorneys, students, juvenile court personnel, mental health workers, vocational training instructors, civic groups, and other interested citizens. Staff attorneys will organize and meet regularly with standing committees of mental health professionals, vocational rehabilitation workers, and juvenile court personnel to receive feedback and formulate new plans.

Dear Sister Holleran:

This is in answer to your letter of October 16th, appealing for a change in policy in regard to identification of the author of a letter appearing in the September American Teacher. In previous correspondence with the author of the letter, I have made the mistake of indulging in some tongue in cheek statements; therefore, let me try to deal seriously with the matter of the anonymous letter.

The American Teacher is a "house organ" published to advance the interest of the American Federation of Teachers. What is printed in the American Teacher is a matter of judgement, in the first instance by the Editor, and in the second upon review, by the President, or his representative. No member has a right to have his letter printed and, in fact, every month there are a number which are not printed.

As I informed the author of the letter, I was opposed to printing it at all, with or without attribution, mainly because I felt many AFT members would be offended by our using American Teacher space to publish a letter written by an employee of a rival organization. The Editor said that he had nothing in the galleys to substitute for the letter in question, and he suggested as a sort of compromise that the letter be run but without identification as to source - which was done.

At any rate, there is little or nothing which can be done about this now, and I do not intend to use American Teacher space for the purpose of identifying the writer.

Fraternally,

David Selden

Neither the Xerox bill nor the bill for the Davis case need to be paid any time soon. So our actual working deficit is $737.70

The ad cost $2,112.06. National ACLU agreed to cover half the expense. National has gotten back $111.00 (50% of the ad response) and we have gotten $111.00 from the response. In addition we got $284 in pre-ad donations. So our loss on the ad, if no further donations are received is $661.03. At this point we can pay back the loans at the rate of 58% to cover our loss from the ad. If we did that our actual working deficit would be approximately $76.

BACKGROUND STATEMENT ON PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO ACLU CONSTITUTION CONCERNING PROCEDURES FOR FORMULATING AGENDA AND RULES OF THE BIENNIAL CONFERENCE

On September 29, 1973 the national Board of Directors approved several amendments to the ACLU Constitution concerning procedures governing the formulation of the Biennial Conference agenda and rules. Under the ACLU Constitution, the amendments must be approved by a two-thirds vote of the electorate (members of the national Board and members of the affiliate Boards). The text of these amendments is as follows (deletions from the present language are in brackets and additions to the present language are underlined):

Section 8: OFFICERS AND COMMITTEES

(C) The Biennial Conference Committee shall be responsible for overall planning and conduct of each Biennial Conference.

(1) It shall act as an arrangement committee in respect to the Conference, receiving from affiliates, the National Board, the National Advisory Council, and other interested parties suggestions and proposals in respect to the program, agenda, and structure of the Conference.

(2) It shall establish and propose for adoption by each Biennial Conference an agenda and such rules as it considers necessary or appropriate.

(3) It shall be composed of seven persons, and shall be appointed by the chairperson of the Corporation, with the advice and consent of the National Board; provided that no more than three shall be members of the National Board of Directors, and one shall be a member of the National Advisory Council. The remaining three members shall be recommended by the immediately preceding Biennial Conference. Provided that no member of the Committee shall be appointed for more than two consecutive terms and also provided that no more than three members shall be appointed for a second consecutive term.

(4) The terms of the members of the Committee shall expire following the Biennial Conference, on the date upon which their successors are designated.

Section 10: BIENNIAL CONFERENCE

(A) A conference shall be held biennially at a time and place to be fixed by the National Board of Directors, provided that at least each second time it shall be held in a city other than that of the national headquarters (preferably in rotation among the main geographical sections). Affiliate Board members, other duly authorized representatives, and professional employees of ACLU or affiliates may attend the Conference, and speak at the discretion of the chair. Delegates entitled to vote and to speak shall be as follows: all members of the National Board and National Advisory Council, and further delegates selected by affiliates, the number of which shall be determined according to the following formula:

(Note: Formula omitted)

In voting at a Biennial Conference, no delegate shall cast more than one vote; no proxy votes shall be cast or counted; and no affiliate shall have authority to bind or impose any form of unit rule upon its voting delegates. A roll-call vote shall be taken and recorded in the minutes at the request of ten or more delegates.

(B) The Conference may consider any matter of concern to the Union, and may make binding recommendations thereon to the National Board of Directors. [A roll-call vote shall be taken and recorded in the minutes at the request of ten or more delegates.]

(1) The Biennial Conference Committee shall circulate to the affiliates and the National Board of Directors the agenda and the rules it will propose to the Biennial Conference no less than 120 days before the Biennial Conference. Should any affiliate board or any ten members of the National Board propose, no less than 45 days before the Biennial Conference, any addition or amendment to the agenda or the rules as circulated, the Committee shall consider the proposal and either accept or reject it. In either case, the Committee shall promptly notify the affiliates and the delegates to the Biennial Conference of the proposed addition or amendment and of the action the Committee has taken in respect to each such proposal.

(2) The Conference shall, at its first meeting, consider the agenda and the rules proposed by the Committee. Adoption of any addition or amendment proposed 45 days or more before the Biennial Conference, if moved by any delegate and seconded, shall be by a simple majority vote of the delegates voting, a quorum being present (a quorum being a majority of registered delegates).

Adoption of any addition or amendment not previously proposed and not included in the notice to the affiliates and the delegates, if moved by any delegate with ten supporting delegate signatures, shall be by a two-thirds vote of the delegates voting, a quorum being present.

(3) The adoption of the agenda and of the rules shall be by a simple majority. Once adopted, the agenda and the rules shall not be amended or suspended except by a two-thirds vote of the delegates voting, a quorum being present.

(C) The substance of any binding recommendation made by the Conference shall be considered adopted by the National Board of Directors unless the Board shall within 18 months from the time such Conference shall adjourn at a meeting thereof decide otherwise by a majority vote of those present, a quorum being a majority of its actual membership, such vote to be taken by name and so recorded in the minutes. Such a decision not to adopt such a Conference recommendation shall then be submitted for referendum vote. Participants in the referendum shall be members of the Board of an affiliate . . . .

Constitution Committee Report

The Constitution Committee developed its recommendations primarily in response to the problem, which has frequently faced Biennial Conferences, of last minute addition of topics to the agenda by delegates at the opening Conference session. The Committee noted that although these topics often present issues of great interest and urgency, many Conference participants have been concerned that the quality of discussion may be hampered by the lack of advanced notice and advance preparation by all of the delegates.

During its discussions, the Constitution Committee noted that the proposed amendments to Section 8 closely follow the existing structure and functions of the Biennial Conference Committee, and would merely give to these constitutional status. It was felt that because of the importance of the Biennial Conference, it was appropriate to give the Biennial Conference Committee constitutional status.

The Constitution Committee's formulation differed from that adopted by the Board in only one substantial way: In paragraph (C)(3) of Section 8, three members of the Biennial Conference Committee would be members of affiliate boards (appointed after seeking suggestions from affiliates), three would be members of the National Board of Directors, and one a member of the National Advisory Council.

With regard to the proposed changes in Section 10, the following points were noted. 1) The change concerning a roll call vote in Section 10(A) is a matter of editorial tidiness in moving the requirement from Section B to Section A. 2) The first sentence of subsection (B) differs from the existing language in that it specifies binding recommendations. The Committee thought it to be understood that the Conference may make horatory recommendations to the Board on any subject, and that the only power of the Conference which requires constitutional force is the power to make a binding recommendation. 3) The timetable set forth for the development of an agenda, and for the consideration of agenda proposals by the Biennial Conference Committee (subsections (B)(1) and (2)), is designed to assure that issues proposed for discussion immediately before the Conference, without sufficient time for the delegates to prepare themselves and for the affiliates to consider the issues, could be added to the agenda only by a two-thirds vote of the delegates, rather than by a simple majority. It was thought that any such late proposal which could command a two-thirds vote was probably an issue upon which the delegates felt themselves ready and prepared to act, and probably represented a subject of widespread concern. Otherwise, the proposed amendment would require that any subject upon which the Conference could adopt a binding recommendation would have to be on the agenda far in advance of the opening session.

The proposed amendment would permit delegates at the time of the Conference to place upon the agenda by a simple majority vote any issue which was proposed more than 45 days before the Conference, even if the Biennial Conference Committee had decided not to place it on the agenda. Thus, while the Committee would be given wide powers of discretion in shaping the agenda, it would not be able to block any subject upon which the delegates felt strongly. 4) The suggestions concerning adoption of the agenda in Section 10(B)(3) were made simply to round out the procedure for consideration of the Conference agenda and rules. After proposing various methods for shaping the agenda, it was thought necessary to include in the Constitution a specific provision for adoption of the final agenda and rules. The provision tracks Robert's Rules of Order. 5) The proposed amendment in Section 10(C) concerning the word "binding" follows the change proposed in Section 10(B) (See 2 above).

Board Discussion

In presenting the Constitution Committee report to the Board, David Carliner noted that the function of the Biennial Conference Committee and the preparation of the Conference agenda are not presently referred to in the Constitution, but that they should be because of their importance.

Jon Johnston, Chairman of the Biennial Conference Committee, offered the Committee's proposed substitute amendment to Section 8(C)(3) providing that no more than three members of the Biennial Conference Committee shall be members of the National Board of Directors, that one shall be a member of the National Advisory Council, and that the remaining three members shall be recommended by the immediately preceding Biennial Conference. He noted that this would give each Biennial Conference a role in the planning of the next Biennial Conference. He did not consider it necessary that the three members to be chosen by the Biennial Conference be members of the affiliate Boards. The procedure for electing these three would be as follows: names would be recommended by a plenary session of the Conference and election would take place by mail ballot after the Conference.

David Carliner opposed the Johnston amendment on the grounds that delegates to the Biennial Conference are not necessarily members of affiliate boards and may be less informed than affiliate board members. He further opposed it because it would permit staff members to serve on the Committee.

Paul Meyer proposed an amendment specifying that the three members chosen by the Biennial Conference be non-staff members. He asserted that the organization should maintain a proper delineation between people who make policy and the people who are hired to carry it out. George Slaff opposed this suggestion, stating that staff members should not be disqualified from important policy making bodies. They can contribute as much as national or affiliate board members, and the Biennial Conference should have input from the entire organization since it is the most democratic of ACLU bodies. He further noted that some affiliate executive directors are members of their own boards. The amendment was withdrawn.

The Johnston substitute amendment carried by a show of hands. Section 8 as amended carried by a show of hands.

Jon Johnston proposed two amendments to the proposed Section 10(B)(2). A quorum would be defined as a majority of registered delegates. Secondly, a delegate moving the adoption of any addition or amendment to the agenda not previously proposed and not included in the notice to the affiliates and the delegates, would be required to have ten supporting delegate signatures. Both amendments were approved by a show of hands.

Marvin Schachter suggested eliminating the 45-day limitation on proposing additions or amendments to the agenda or rules as circulated, and eliminating the two-thirds majority required for the adoption of any addition or amendment not previously proposed and not included in the notice to the affiliates and the delegates. David Isbell argued against the proposal, noting the need for advance notice and preparation. He further asserted that an urgent issue will command the necessary two-thirds vote to be put on the agenda. Mel Strauss noted that the Constitution Committee proposal was a breaking device to keep items most in the news at that time from dominating the Biennial Conference agenda. Marvin Karpatkin asserted that the Committee's proposal was undemocratic. Others argued that it was simply a matter of adequate preparation and was in no way intended to be undemocratic. The Schachter proposal was defeated by a vote of 33-17.

Section 10 as amended was carried by a show of hands.

Re: CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Enclosed are explanatory materials and a ballot for a series of proposed amendments to the ACLU Constitution concerning procedures governing the formulation of the Biennial Conference agenda and rules.

The following materials are included:

1. Instructions for voting.

2. Background statement on the proposed constitutional amendments.

3. Ballot on constitutional amendment.

Please note that the ballots should be placed in the single unmarked envelope and deposited in the larger addressed envelope. Please have your ballots postmarked not later than December 16, 1973.

ACLU of Georgia is totally committed to an integrated - really integrated - school system, and believes that goal can only be achieved by a metro-type approach - a multi-county system.

The Board voted to consider how to best achieve that Metropolitan system. Legal solutions such as intervention in the Atlanta suit now before the court, a separate law suit or other means, are under consideration.

RE: Informal luncheon to discuss harassment of civil rights leaders in North Carolina. Friday, July 27, noon, ACLU of Georgia office, 88 Walton Street, N.W.

Although it seldom makes the front page anymore, harassment of civil rights activity continues in the South. Sometimes its a series of isolated incidents. Often though, coordinated attacks in the style of the mid 1960's are mounted on civil rights movements. A good example of this was the series of demonstrations in Columbus, Georgia after black policemen protested racial discrimination. There, the ACLU of Georgia defended a number of persons who were arrested during that movement.

In the last two years local and state officials in North Carolina have attempted to stop the active civil rights movement in that state. In Charlotte, three civil rights leaders were convicted of burning down a stable. The stable was the scene of a civil rights protest in 1967. In 1968 the stable burned. At the time, no mention was made of arson. Then, four years after the fire three civil rights activists were arrested. One was sentenced to ten years and another got twenty. Jim Grant who has worked for VISTA, SCLC, SCEF, and the AFSC was sentenced to a total of 35 years despite the fact that he was in Philadelphia, Pa. the day of the incident. Grant is now in the Atlanta Penitentiary.

In 1971 a series of demonstrations were held by the black community in Wilmington, N.C. A group called the Rights of White People began vigilante attacks on the black community. Local authorities made little effort to stop the attacks and three civil rights leaders were arrested. Rev. Ben Chavis, an SCLC board member and staff member of the Commission for Racial Justice of the United Church of Christ, was charged with burning down a grocery store. Then he and Ms. Mollie Hicks and her daughter were charged with accessory after murder after a young man guarding a house in the black community was shot. This summer just before the trial on the latter charges, the offices of the leading black newspaper in Wilmington were firebombed.

Ms. Hicks and representatives from the defense committee in Charlotte will be in Atlanta this week to discuss the state-wide pattern of repression in that state. The meeting Friday will be an informal discussion in the ACLU seminar room. Bring a sandwich if you wish to eat lunch and feel free to invite anyone you know who might be interested.

the keystone on which all programs for a decent society must ultimately depend is the sovereignty of the individual as defined in the constitution and the bill of rights

CIVIL LIBERTIES: THE CRUCIAL ISSUE

By JUSTICE WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS

MOST MODERN CONSTITUTIONS contain promises of things that government must do for people. Our Constitution, an 18th Century product, guarantees no one such benefits as an education, social security or the right to work. It is not a welfare-state document. To the contrary, it specifies in some detail what government may not do to the individual. In other words, it was designed to take government off the backs of people and majorities off the backs of minorities.

It stakes out boundaries that no executive, no legislature, no judiciary may violate. The "law and order" advocates never seem to understand that simple constitutional principle. An example will illustrate what I mean. The First Amendment says that government may not abridge the free exercise of religion. Suppose a city enacts an ordinance that provides that no minister may deliver a sermon without first obtaining a permit from the Department of Safety. To exact a license before the citizen may exercise a constitutional right is to abridge that right. No minister worth his salt would knuckle under. If he defied the ordinance, he would be acting in the best American tradition. If he were prosecuted, the unconstitutionality of the ordinance would be a complete defense. The person who concludes that a law is unconstitutional and defies it runs the risk, of course, that he guessed wrong. Yet his punishment is not thereby compounded. Law and order is the guiding star of totalitarians, not of free men.

This principle of civil disobedience can be appreciated only if the antecedents of our Constitution and Bill of Rights are understood.

The ideas of freedom, liberty and sovereignty of the individual reflected in the two documents come from a long stream of history. The ideas of political freedom trace at least as far back as the Athenian model. But the political freedom of classical Greece did not guarantee private freedom, which was first emphasized by the Romans through the development of natural law. The church added the tradition of a divine order and a set of precepts based on the integrity of the individual before God; the Reformation gave the individual a choice of religio-political orders. The divine right of kings—one form of the social contract—was successfully challenged by the end of the 17th Century. Rousseau's Social Contract was a frontal assault.

But the single thinker who had the most direct impact on the framers of the Constitution was John Locke. Locke taught that morality, religion and politics should conform to God's will as revealed in the essential nature of man. God gave man reason and conscience as natural guides to distinguish between good and bad; and they were not to be restrained by an established church or by a king or a dynasty. Isaac Newton, who in 1687 published Principia, his great work, seemed to abolish mystery from the world and enable a rational mind to uncover the secrets of nature and nature's God. This parallel thought gave wings to Locke, who wrote:

> Men being . . . all free, equal and independent, no one can be put out of his estate, and subjected to the political power of another, without his consent. The only way whereby any one divests himself of his liberty and puts on the bonds of civil society is by agreeing with other men to join and unite into a community, for their comfortable, safe and peaceable living one amongst another, in a secure enjoyment of their properties and a greater security against any that are not of it. . . . When any number of men have so consented to make one community or government, they are thereby presently incorporated and make one body politic, wherein the majority have a right to act and conclude the rest.

These ideas were well known to our Colonists through the church as well as through Locke, Newton and many other writers. God, nature and reason were the foundations of politics and government; they were extolled in the Declaration of Independence and further distilled in constitutional precepts.

The foregoing is but an outline of the history of ideas behind the Constitution. They were translated into the body of Anglo-American law in a series of crucial test cases over a period of at least 400 years.

The political counterpart of heresy in the 16th Century was treason. The law of England allowed a man to be tried for treason if he "doth compass or imagine the death" of the king. This was called "constructive treason," for the accused did not have to lift his hand against the king to be guilty; all he need do was wish the king were dead. As a result, treason is narrowly defined in our Constitution: "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies . . ." and the proof required is very strict. That clause is the product of the philosophy of Madison and Jefferson. Madison wanted treason narrowly defined, because history showed that "newfangled and artificial treasons" were the "great engines" by which partisan factions "wreaked their alternate malignity on each other." Jefferson had the like view, pointing out that the definitions of treason often failed to distinguish between "acts against government" and "acts against the oppressions of the government." Madison and Jefferson are strangers to our law-and-order school, whose spokesmen go so far these days as to call dissent to our Vietnam policy "treason."

In the 17th Century, it was the practice to force citizens to make loans to the British crown, failing which the citizen would be jailed and languish there without bail. Thomas Darnel met that fate in 1627. From his prison, he applied for a writ of habeas corpus, the conventional way in those days of testing the legality of a confinement. The case was argued before judges who were appointees of the king, serving at his pleasure. They ruled that they were required to "walk in the steps of our forefathers," that the word of the king was sufficient to hold a man, saying, "We trust him in great matters." This case resulted in the Petition of Right of 1628, which led to vesting in Parliament, rather than in the king, the authority to levy taxes; and it also established the prisoner's right to bail.

The legislative branch was also a source of oppression. A bill of attainder is an act of the legislature punishing individuals or members of a group without a judicial trial. Its vice is that it condemns a person by legislative fiat without the benefit of a trial having all the safeguards of due process of law. English history, as well as our own history between 1776 and 1787, is replete with instances where the legislature, by its own fiat, subjected men to penalties and punishments. The Constitution abolishes bills of attainder outright, both at the state and at the Federal level.

The foregoing are merely examples of how the sovereignty of the individual was, historically speaking, jeopardized by acts of all branches of Government—the Executive, the Legislative and the Judicial.

The fear of our forefathers was also a fear of the majority of the people who from time to time might crush a minority that did not conform to the dominant religious creed or who in other ways were ideological strays.

One episode that occurred in this nation just before the 1787 Philadelphia Convention is illustrative. Times were hard in 1786. A post-War depression had hit the country. The state legislatures were swept by agrarian influences. Debtors wanted relief. There was no strong central government. Only Congress, under the feeble Articles of Confederation, had national authority, and it was not in a position to act decisively.

Up at Northampton, Massachusetts, in August 1786, Daniel Shays moved into action. His armed group seized the courthouse in order to put an end to legal proceedings for the collection of debts. The example at Northampton was followed in other parts of the state, about 2000 armed men joining Shays. Courts were paralyzed. In September, Shays' men moved on Springfield and overawed the court with their claims that their leaders should not be indicted and that there should be a moratorium on the collection of debts. They also insisted that the militia be disbanded. The stakes were high, because at Springfield there was a Federal arsenal filled with artillery, guns and ammunition, which Shays planned to take. The decisive engagement took place on January 25, 1787, the Shays group being routed by militia equipped with Federal cannon.

Shays' Rebellion gave impetus not only to a strong central Government but also to checks and restraints on populism. The mercantile, financial and large landed interests were getting tired of talk of the rights of man; they were becoming concerned with the protection of their property. Too much democracy in the state governments, it was argued, was bringing bad times on the country. Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Rhode Island were said to be disintegrating. General Henry Knox, in the mood of our modern law-and-order men, wrote Washington from Massachusetts in the fall of 1786: "This dreadful situation, for which our Government has made no adequate provision, has alarmed every man of principle and property in New England."

Though Shays' Rebellion was shortly put down, the populist or agrarian forces remained in control of some state legislatures and repudiation of debts remained a threat. Majorities in state legislatures ruled without restraint. The commercial, financial and landed interests moved to Philadelphia for the Constitutional Convention in an antidemocratic mood. A republican form of government emerged that, to use the words of Madison, was designed "to protect the minority of the opulent against the majority." This majority, Madison said on another occasion, might well be the landless proletariat.

Numerous barriers were written into the Constitution designed to thwart the will of majorities. As Charles A. Beard said in his monumental work An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution of the United States, those who campaigned for ratification of the Constitution made "their most cogent arguments" to the owners of property "anxious to find a foil against the attacks of leveling democracy."

While the House was to be elected for a short term by the people, Senators (until the 17th Amendment) were selected by the state legislatures; and the President was picked for a fixed term by electors chosen by the people. Thus, a measure of assurance was granted that majority groups would not be able to unite against the minority propertied interests. Moreover, amendment of the Constitution was made laborious: Two thirds of both the Senate and the House were to propose amendments; three fourths of the states were to ratify them. A final check or balance was an independent judiciary named by the President, approved by the Senate and serving for life.

The "minority of the opulent" were also protected when it came to the Bill of Rights, as in the provisions in the Fifth Amendment that "private property" could not be taken for a "public purpose" without payment of "just compensation."

But the Bill of Rights went much, much further. It was concerned with all minorities, not only the minority of the opulent. Government was taken off the backs of all people and the individual was made sovereign when it came to making speeches and publishing papers, tracts and books. Those domains had "no trespassing" signs that government must heed.

Great battles have raged over those guarantees. Peaceful and orderly opposition to the Government—even by Communists—is, of course, constitutionally protected. Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes said: "The maintenance of the opportunity for free political discussion to the end that government may be responsive to the will of the people and that changes may be obtained by lawful means, an opportunity essential to the security of the republic, is a fundamental principle of our constitutional system."

American law also honors protests, whether they are in the form of letters to the editor, picketing, marches on the statehouse or rallies to whip up action. As already noted, police historically have arrested dissenters for "disorderly conduct" and "breach of the peace," often using these devices to suppress an unpopular minority. But such charges are no longer permissible at either the state or Federal level, though the law-and-order men often try to use "vagrancy" or other misdemeanors to suppress dissent or to promote racism.

Government is also constrained against interfering with one's free exercise of religion. A man can worship how and where he pleases. Government at times has preferred one religion over another, giving it privileges as respects marriages, baptisms and the like, and even putting some prelates on the public payroll. The Bill of Rights bans this practice by prohibiting the "establishment" of any religion by the Government.

It was the pride of British tradition that a man's home was his castle. Even the king could not enter without legal process. On this side of the Atlantic, British officers had ransacked homes (and offices as well) under search warrants that were good for all time and for all kinds of evidence. This led to the Fourth Amendment, which, in general, requires an officer making a search to have a warrant issued by a judge on a showing of probable cause that a crime has been committed. And the warrant must describe with particularity the scope of the search and the articles or person to be seized. Modern technology has developed electronic devices that can record what goes on in the sanctuary of a home without entering the home in any conventional sense. They, too, have now been included within the Fourth Amendment. Yet the law-and-order propagandists would brush aside the Fourth Amendment and use any short cut to convict any unpopular person.

The much misunderstood self-incrimination clause of the Fifth Amendment had a similar history: "No person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." At one time in England, the oath that one takes to tell the truth was used against the accused with devastating effect. If he refused to take the oath, he was held in contempt and punished. If he took the oath and then refused to answer a question, the refusal was taken as a confession of the thing charged in the question. Thus were men compelled to testify against themselves.

A widely heralded defiance of this practice was that of John Lilburne, who was charged with sending scandalous books into England. He refused to be examined under oath, saying that the oath was "both against the law of God and the law of the land." He announced that he would never take it, "though I be pulled to pieces by wild horses." Lilburne was held in contempt, publicly whipped, fined and placed in solitary confinement. That was in 1638. On February 13, 1645, the House of Lords set aside that judgment as "against the liberty of the subject and law of the land and Magna Charta." And in 1648, Lilburne was granted damages for his imprisonment.

The idea spread to this country. The Puritans who came here knew of the detested oath that Lilburne refused to take. They, too, had been its victims. The Body of Liberties, adopted in 1641 by Massachusetts, afforded protection against self-incrimination either through torture or through the oath. The high-handed practices of the royal governors who believed in law and order and who sought to compel citizens to accuse themselves of crimes also whipped up sentiment for the immunity. A majority of the colonists, therefore, as part of their programs for independence, adopted bills of rights that included the immunity against self-incrimination. Later, it was written into the Fifth Amendment and into most state constitutions.

The immunity has been broadly interpreted. It extends to all manner of proceedings in which testimony is taken, including legislative committees. It was early held by the Supreme Court to give immunity from testifying not only to acts or events that themselves constitute a crime or that are elements of a crime but also to things that "will tend to criminate him" or subject him to fines, penalties or forfeitures. As Chief Justice John Marshall put it at the beginning, immunity protects the witness from supplying any "link" in a chain of testimony that would convict him. Yet in spite of this long history, the law-and-order propagandists denounce the decisions that forbid the police from using coercion to obtain confessions from people in custody.

The protection against double jeopardy, the right to counsel, the right to confront the person who accuses one, the guarantee against cruel and unusual punishment—these all have a similar specific and detailed history of abuse by government. Each reflects a clear and calculated design to prevent government from meddling with individual lives.

The law-and-order people say that "criminals" and "Communists" deserve no such protection. But the Constitution draws no line between the good and the bad, the popular and the unpopular. The word is "person," which, of course, includes "aliens." Every person is under the umbrella of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights. The Bill of Rights purposely makes it difficult for police, prosecutors, investigating committees, judges and even juries to convict anyone. We know that the net that often closes around an accused man is a flimsy one. Circumstantial evidence often implicates the innocent as well as the guilty. Some countries have the inquisitorial system, in which the criminal case is normally made out from the lips of the accused. But our system is different; it is accusatorial. Those who make the charge must prove it. They carry the burden. The sovereignty of the individual is honored by a presumption of innocence.

The principle of equality entered our constitutional system with the Civil War amendments, which banned discrimination based on race, creed, color or poverty. So today we stand for both liberty and equality. The Russians who protested the 1966 Ukrainian trials came out strong for liberty: "The highest saturation of material goods, without free thought and will," creates "a great prison in which the food rations of prisoners are increased." Whatever continent one visits, he finds man asserting his sovereignty—and usually receiving punishment for doing so. There are few places in the world where man can think and speak as he chooses and walk with his chin held high. Yet in spite of our commitment to both, we are confronted with tremendous internal discontent. Some are in rebellion only to obtain control over existing institutions so that they may use them for their own special or selfish ends. But most of the discontent, I think, comes from individuals who clamor for sovereign rights—not rights expressed in laws but rights expressed in jobs and in other dignified positions in our society. We face civil disobedience on a massive scale.

Civil disobedience, though at times abused, has an honored place in our traditions. Some people refuse to pay taxes because the money raised is for a purpose they disapprove. That is not a permissible course of conduct; for, by and large, the legislative branch has carte blanche to prepare budgets and levy taxes. It would paralyze government to let each taxpayer exercise the sovereign right to pay or not to pay, depending on whether he approves of the social, economic or political program of those in power. The same is true, in general, of most other laws imposed on the citizen, whether it be observing a speed law or obeying a zoning ordinance or a littering regulation.

Gandhi's much-publicized civil disobedience was quite different. It expressed a universal principle. Gandhi had no political remedy to right a wrong. Disobedience of the law embodying the wrong was his only recourse. Colonial India, like Colonial America, was under a foreign yoke. Regulations were often imposed from overseas or taxes exacted by the fiat of the colonial ruler. The subject had to submit or else. "Taxation without representation" was one of the complaints of both Sam Adams and Mahatma Gandhi. Our Declaration of Independence stated the philosophy—all men are created equal; they are endowed by their Creator with certain "inalienable rights." Governments derive their just powers from "the consent of the governed"; and whenever a form of government becomes "destructive to those ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it." Thus, the right of revolution is deep in our heritage. Nat Turner did not get the benefit of our Declaration of Independence. But he moved to the measure of its philosophy. These days, some people are caught in a pot of glue and have no chance to escape through use of a political remedy. Civil disobedience, therefore, evolves into revolution and is used as a means of escape.

Revolution is therefore basic in the rights of man. Where problems and oppression pile high and citizens are denied all recourse to political remedies, only revolution is left. Sometimes revolution with violence is the only remedy. Violence often erupts these days in Latin America and Southeast Asia, where feudal and military regimes hold people in a vise, making it impossible for them to be freed from oppression by the political processes. In some nations, a trade-union organizer is considered an enemy and is shot. So is a person who tries to organize the peasants into cooperatives. In those extreme situations, there is no machinery for change except violence.

We have had civil disobedience accompanied by violence, the bloodiest one being the Civil War. Prior to that, there was the widespread rebellion under John Adams against the Alien and Sedition Acts, which made it a crime to utter any false or malicious statement about the nation, the President or Congress. The Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions called them a "nullity," because—by reason of the First Amendment—Congress may pass no law abridging freedom of speech or press. Those laws expired under Jefferson and for years the country reimbursed the victims for the wrongs done.

(concluded on page 223)

The Embargo Act was a self-blockade, in the sense that it forbade the departure of any ships from American ports to foreign countries. Jefferson tried in vain to enforce it, and it was repealed in 1809.

In World War One, there were about 300,000 draft dodgers, in spite of the fact that Congress passed a declaration of war.

Some of those episodes were accompanied by violence and many people were fined or imprisoned for their misdeeds. During those crises, the majority clamored for conformity. The minority, impatient at the existence of laws they deemed unjust, took matters into their own hands and did not wait until the power to correct the abuse at the polls could be exercised.

Today the dissenters, both black and white, claim that the changes needed to admit the lower fourth of our people into an honored place in our society are being thwarted. There is a growing feeling that the existing political parties are not likely instruments of change. The colleges' and universities' administrations, in general, walk more and more to the measure of traditional thought and have lost their revolutionary influence. The Cold War flourishes, diminishing our overseas potential and making the military the most potent force in our lives and in our economy. The puritan ethic—hard work and industry will guarantee success—is not valid in a system of private enterprise that is less and less dependent on labor. For many, the only recourse for employment is in the public sector; yet blueprints for an expanding public sector are hardly ever in public view. Racial discrimination takes an awful toll, as partially evidenced by the fact that the average annual income of whites who go to work at the end of the eighth grade tends to be higher than the average annual income of blacks who go on to college and enter the professions.

The crises these days are compounded because the real dissenters from the principle of equality in our laws and in the Constitution are often the establishment itself—sometimes a municipal, county or state government; sometimes slumlords allied with corrupt local machines; sometimes finance companies or great corporations or even labor unions. That is to say, these existing institutions often ask minorities to conform to practices and customs that are unconstitutional. People are apt to overlook the fact that those who make such a request are the offenders, not the vociferous minorities who demand their rights.

Rebellion by members of the establishment against full equality cannot be met with apathy and inaction, for that is the stuff out of which violent revolutions are made. Blacks and whites must join hands in momentous programs of political action. Those who put law and order above liberty and equality are architects of a new fascism that would muzzle all dissenters and pay the individuals in our lower strata to remain poor, obedient and subservient.

Unprecedented civic action is needed. When my friend Luis Muñoz Marín first ran for governor of Puerto Rico, he actually drafted and had printed and circulated the precise laws he would have enacted when elected. He was elected and the laws were passed. Those who march need specific proposals in their hands—proposals to put an end to a particular injustice. India, when dealing with the explosive problem of the untouchables, required about 15 percent of all matriculating students and about 15 percent of all government employees to be drawn from those ranks. While the maximum age for taking examinations for government service was generally 24 years, it was increased to 27 years in the case of the untouchables. And this once-abhorred group also has a certain minimum number of seats reserved for it in the national parliament and in the state legislatures.

We need to think in terms as specific as those in dealing with our own minorities, whether black or white. No one today is on the side lines. We are all caught up in a tremendous revolutionary movement. It starts with a demand for equality in educational and employment opportunities. It extends to a removal from our laws of all bias against the poor. It embraces a host of other specifics that will, if faced frankly and adopted, make a viable and decent society out of our multiracial, multireligious, multiideological communities—and both preserve the sovereignty and honor the dignity of each and every individual.

"They're really up tight this year. I got mugged in New York, demonstrated against in Chicago, shot at in Texas and arrested for vagrancy in Seattle."

ACLU-Ga

PROPOSAL

It is proposed that a consolidation of the school systems of the five county Atlanta metropolitan area be sought in the United States District Court. A petition to intervene in the present Atlanta school desegregation case (Calhoun v. Cook) would be filed simultaneously with a separate action. The intervention should be made in the Calhoun case in response to a directive by the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals that the district court make findings of fact and conclusions of law on the question of consolidation. Judge Smith in the Calhoun case hearing recently stated that he thought the "metro issue" should proceed by separate suit. The intervention would provide the vehicle for the Court to direct that we proceed by separate suit and remove several technical problems which could arise if no intervention is attempted.

The plaintiffs would be black and white parents (some would be ad valorem tax payers). Depending on the funds available, plaintiffs might be limited to poor parents so that we could proceed in forma pauperis. This could be important in requesting that the burden of preparing detailed integration plans be the duty of the State, counties, and cities.

The defendants would be the State, Cobb, DeKalb, Fulton, Gwinnette and Clayton Counties and each City or other school district therein.

The relief sought would include a destruction of the artificial city-county boundaries for school purposes, thus creating a base for school desegregation plans metro-wide. It would seek to have the Court order desegration of the metro system under a plan to use the present "neighborhood school" facilities and to develop a long range plan for educational parks, specialized schools, and many other new concepts in education.

Dear Mr. Simcich:

I thought you would like to know about the enclosed pamphlet, Know Your Rights, which is available for local unions or educational programs.

The focus of the pamphlet is on an individual's rights when confronted with police action. It is designed for use with low income and/or minority groups. Some unions are considering the pamphlet for:

(a) Local union education classes.

(b) A more general distribution to their members.

(c) Something they can offer other community groups as an expression of interest in mutual concerns.

The pamphlet was prepared by a committee of lawyers for the A.C.L.U. of Georgia and the Georgia Council on Human Relations.

I can supply sample copies for distribution to interested locals either through your office or mine. Although, we would prefer to recapture our costs (15¢ per pamphlet), we will make them available to any local who actually plans a distribution. In some instances, within the South, we can see that educational programs built around the pamphlet are provided.

Please let me know of your further interest in Know Your Rights.

Sincerely,

Dear Helmuth:

I thought you would like to know about the enclosed pamphlet, Know Your Rights, which is available for local unions or educational programs.

The focus of the pamphlet is on an individual's rights when confronted with police action. It is designed for use with low income and/or minority groups. Some unions are considering the pamphlet for:

(a) Local union education classes.

(b) A more general distribution to their members.

(c) Something they can offer other community groups as an expression of interest in mutual concerns.

The pamphlet was prepared by a committee of lawyers for the A.C.L.U. of Georgia and the Georgia Council on Human Relations.

I can supply sample copies for distribution to interested locals either through your office or mine. Although, we would prefer to recapture our costs (15¢ per pamphlet), we will make them available to any local who actually plans a distribution. In some instances, within the South, we can see that educational programs built around the pamphlet are provided.

Please let me know of your further interest in Know Your Rights.

Sincerely,

Emory F. Via

Dear Emory:

Thanks for letting me see a copy of the pamphlet "Know Your Rights". It is well done, and certainly should be useful in many situations.

However, I feel that a decision on whether and how to use it among at least our groups in the South requires an intimate acquaintance with our local lodge officers, which I personally don't have. It is quite possible that we might find this pamphlet useful in one or two of our Leadership Schools next summer, but for a decision on any immediate distribution I would defer to our educational representative, William Clitheroe in Atlanta.

I believe you know Bill, and I suggest that if you haven't already done so that you show him a copy of this pamphlet, and ask if he thinks it might be helpful in certain lodges which he is acquainted with.

I was nice to hear from you, and I hope you will keep me abreast on things you are doing.

Cordially,

In accordance with our telephone conversation of yesterday, I am enclosing our check in the amount of $150 to purchase 1,000 copies of the booklet "Know Your Rights."

We will send one copy to each of our local unions. Additional copies will be sent to members of local union "Fair Practices Committees." By doing this we should still have perhaps as many as two or three hundred copies left of the 1,000. Therefore, contrary to my suggestion by telephone, I think we should wait until we determine whether local unions will be interested in obtaining additional copies. In the event we receive orders beyond the number we have on hand, we will then transmit the orders to you on whatever basis may be indicated at that time.

I enjoyed our little conversation and I hope that you will set aside the week of June 25, 1967, if possible, so that you can again be with us during our summer school at Black Mountain, North Carolina.

Dear Paul Anthony:

Believing that you share with us a continuing and troubling concern for changing our national priorities so as to create a system in which all our people can flourish, we are eager for you to see a new AFSC publication, MAN & THE ECONOMY: THE SOCIAL IMPLICATIONS OF ECONOMIC PATTERNS. This document has grown out of our long and often frustrating field experience in promoting change in the objective situation in which men exist, and out of our conviction that social policies and programs can succeed only if the individual, not his institutions, stands at the center of all programs.

In MAN & THE ECONOMY we offer recommendations as to major national commitments in employment, housing, education, guaranteed income, health, justice and conservation, programs built upon principles which stress the individual as the recipient of services and the source of control.

MAN & THE ECONOMY is published as a stimulus to discussion and action. We seek your comments, your suggestions for further distribution, your support for those recommendations and principles which you find you can support, and your suggestions for moving forward toward an economy which serves man.

Sincerely yours,

Subject: Emergency School Aid Funds for non-profit groups

Enclosed is a very poor copy of the regulations for the ESA money. You will note that they have been signed by the Commissioner, but not the Secretary. This means that they are subject to change, but folks in Washington say this is probably it.

On Thursday I met with Sidney Gardner, Director Center for Community Planning, Office of the Secretary, Dept. HEW, Washington, D. C. 20201. Area Code 202 962-8975. Mr. Gardner is in charge of the non-profit part of the funds. He seems like a good guy as feds go and was open to discussion about how the funds will be used. He has seen the Educational Resources Center proposal and thinks it is good.

He says that the grants for non-profit will be in two catagories: 1. research and demonstration (these will be large and cover more than one district and 2. individual grants to one district. The question of whether a district is eligible if the LEA is not eligible has not yet been decided. Non-provit groups proposals will be subject to the governor's veto.

They are thinking now of eight types of proposals that they will consider. They are:

1. Remedial and tutroial projects-they would hope different from Title I
2. Community Relations and Information-such things as a Rumor Center, publications and programs to promote dialogue between the community and the school.
3. Monitoring and Evaluation
4. Student Programs (extra cirricualr
5. Parent Involvement
6. Comprehensive planning-this one is for CAPS and Model Cities
7. Activities of the bi-racial committies and this can include staff
8. Grants to Black Universities to provide services for LEA and private groups

Also enclosed is a list of meeting times and places for explanations about the money. I have not yet been able to find out where in these cities. Dr. Bunche in Atlanta claims he doesn't know. I suggest you call Jerry Brader's office in D.C. Area Code 202963-5836

I HAVE just LEARNED that PRESIDENT has til TUESDAY at midnight to veto this & he may do so!

TO: Participants in the discussion of a Regional Institute to encourage quality and equality in education, October 7, 1970.

FROM: Winifred Green, Chairman, Steering Committee

RE: Steering Committee Meeting

DATE: October 21, 1970

The entire committee was present for a meeting in Atlanta on October 20, 1970. You will recall that the members were Winifred Green, Chairman, Rims Barber, Leon Hall, David Jacobs, Eldridge McMillan, and Emory F. Via.

The need for further efforts to assist in school desegregation and for achieving quality education was discussed. It was agreed that some further form of cooperative organization could be useful in meeting those needs.

Funding this year seems most unlikely.

There will be another meeting of the Steering Committee probably in late November or early December to further refine our thinking about a Regional Institute. We will keep you informed.

YOU TOO HAVE A STAKE IN ENDING WAR POVERTY INJUSTICE

AMERICAN FRIENDS SERVICE COMMITTEE

Varieties of Human Agony

In air that can literally swarm with lead at any hour of the day or night, millions of Vietnamese civilians, who neither want the war in their country nor understand it, are caught between Vietcong mortars and U.S. rockets. The result is carnage. The number of dead and wounded runs into the hundreds of thousands annually. In South Vietnam alone, there are more than 60,000 amputees.

About six thousand of these amputees, many of them women and children, have crowded into refugee camps near the city of Quang Ngai, already jammed with hundreds of thousands of sick, wounded, and homeless people. The one general hospital for civilians in Quang Ngai, with only four hundred beds, must accommodate nearly eight hundred patients by putting up to three in a single bed and many more in litters on the floor. Since adequate physical therapy and rehabilitation for such a patient load is quite impossible, many who are discharged soon develop painful and crippling deformities.

To serve these victims of a war whose cruelty is beyond our comprehension, the American Friends Service Committee has been operating a therapy and rehabilitation center on the grounds of the hospital. Physical therapists from the United States and England attend about 70 patients a day, and Vietnamese trainees, under the supervision of AFSC staff prosthetists, construct and fit about seventy-five artificial limbs a month.

Since many of the refugees in South Vietnam are orphans, the Committee also sponsors a child day care center in Quang Ngai. Staffed by South Vietnamese women, the center furnishes eighty-five young refugees a day with a balanced diet, clean clothing, badly needed rest, and enough instruction in reading to qualify for admission to the government schools.

At these Quaker centers in Quang Ngai, two special varieties of human agony—the nightmare of dismemberment and the bewildered suffering of the young—are reached and relieved. Applied to the appalling number of civilian casualties, the two AFSC projects in Quang Ngai are a small attempt to say that some of the people here care about all of the people there—and feel bound to show it in immediate, practical ways.

You can help the rehabilitation center restore wholeness, dignity, and hope to human beings traumatically wounded in body and spirit. You can help children at the day care center to regain their health and to embark on their education at a critical time for themselves and for their stricken country.

Housing the Dignity of Man

The black community in Elizabeth, New Jersey, is frustrated and angry. Homes are being demolished to make way for urban renewal and highway expansion, but the city, caught between a rising need for services and a shrinking tax base, has not made provision for relocating displaced families in adequate housing.

Any place in Elizabeth, no matter how miserable, where a black family could live, has been taken long ago by others evicted from the renewal area, and the doomed community is ringed by ethnic neighborhoods where blacks are not tolerated. Owning almost none of the businesses in Elizabeth, under-employed, under-represented in city government, and having no effective voice in the conduct of urban affairs, these black families must abandon their homes and move on—to Harlem, Bedford-Stuyvesant, and other ghettos. It seems the ancient paradox still holds! Foxes have holes and birds of the air have nests, but in Elizabeth—and in many American communities like it—the dignity of man has nowhere to house itself.

American Friends Service Committee workers in Elizabeth are helping the black community to form citizens' groups which can make themselves heard in city hall. Residents have met with city officials, and a grant from the New Jersey Department of Community Affairs will obtain housing for fifty large, low-income families. Efforts continue to get more funds committed for adequate relocation services.

The project's ultimate goal is to locate suitable housing for all residents of the renewal area, by arranging for financial assistance, by changing the attitudes of surrounding neighborhoods, by gaining city-wide acceptance of open housing, and by making more low-income housing available.

You can help the residents of the renewal area to learn what their rights are as American citizens and how to assert them peacefully by using techniques of community organization. The spreading cancer of ghettoization cannot be removed by a municipal bulldozer. The forlorn process by which it is always the rootless who get evicted and the poor who get poorer must be reversed if American life is to be made liveable for all Americans. Community Relations programs of the American Friends Service Committee operate in many communities across the country.

Your contribution can stimulate leadership in such communities and help to demolish the barriers between races instead of the homes of the poor.

Nigeria Postwar Relief and Reconstruction

In keeping with the Quaker concern for responding to human need without regard to the politics, race, or religion of those who suffer, the AFSC, in cooperation with the Mennonite Central Committee and the British Friends Service Council, established emergency medical care and feeding programs on both sides of the Nigerian civil war. Quaker Service doctors and nurses joined with local Nigerian staff in operating feeding stations, rural outpatient clinics, and hospitals in the parts of Nigeria most severely affected by the war.

When the fighting ended, AFSC field teams were already furthering emergency efforts to bring food, medical care, and housing to many of the refugees who streamed from areas where the final days of fighting had taken place. Using the QUAC stick (Quaker Arm Circumference), the teams are able to determine quickly which individuals are in greatest need of emergency feeding. Devised by the Quaker staff in Nigeria, the QUAC stick enables a relatively untrained person to measure a child's upper arm and height and, from predetermined standards, ascertain the degree of malnutrition.

AFSC medical and reconstruction staff, working in consultation with Nigerian national and state authorities, are currently engaged in five 24-month programs of postwar reconstruction in the war-affected areas of Nigeria: a program for assistance to children separated from their families in South-Eastern State; a program of community reconstruction and rehabilitation in the towns of Ibusa and Asaba in Mid-West State; hospital rehabilitation at Abiriba, East-Central State; rural medical rehabilitation in portions of South-East State; and reconstruction of 175 war-ravaged villages in Enyong Division, South-Eastern State. The programs are staffed by 20 expatriates and 22 Nigerians (including Ibos).

Funds for food, medical care, medicines, and the reconstruction of housing, schools, and hospitals are urgently needed for expanding AFSC service in postwar Nigeria.

Progress in Cuauhtenco

In three short years, without the upheaval that so often accompanies—and vitiates—social change, the villagers of Cuauhtenco, Mexico, have passed through a genuine revolution.

In 1966, Fidel Munoz raised eight bushels of corn per acre. In 1967, he raised forty bushels per acre, and had to store the overflow in his house. By 1969, he could purchase a machine for shelling corn and petition the governor of the State of Tlaxcala for needed improvements in his village. In three years, a subsistence farmer had entered the developing economy of Mexico by becoming a producer of surpluses; in three years, a marginal citizen had entered the political life of his country by participating in its institutions and using its agencies.

Senor Munoz' revolution began in 1966 when the leaders of Cuauhtenco invited a team from the American Friends Service Committee to come to their village to live.

After gaining the trust of the community by living with them for nearly a year, the team chose Fidel and several other farmers who agreed to try something new. In return for their willingness to experiment with new methods, these farmers were guaranteed an income that was at least equal to that produced by their previous year's crop. The team arranged for credit for fertilizer, seeds, and insecticides; and the farmers supplied the labor.

The result was a dramatic breakthrough for Cuauhtenco. Among the farmers in the experimental group, crop production in 1967 increased four or five times over the previous year.

In 1968, more farmers joined the program, and more intensive methods yielded a greater increase in crop production. In 1969, farmers from five nearby villages entered the project, and the agricultural Bank of Mexico extended credit totalling 300,000 pesos ($24,000) for the purchase of fertilizer. In spite of the adverse effects of a late rainfall, fertilized fields had two to three times the crop yield of unfertilized fields.

For these farmers, whose lives are wholly shaped by the details of planting and harvesting, an agricultural revolution is a human revolution—a radical and pervasive change in human routine and attitude. Less enslaved to the land for a meagre and lonely existence, they are now freer to expand their lives as individuals and to improve their community. They are working to get a village water supply and modern medical service to end the scourge of traditional disease.

Because the revolution at Cuauhtenco has helped people to help themselves—to transform their community by their own efforts—individual lives have been filled with hope and a new sense of personal worth.

It is this kind of peaceful revolution—a revolution of hope wrought without social upheaval—which you can help to carry forward as you join forces with the AFSC in Cuauhtenco, elsewhere in Mexico, and in other countries where the Committee is actively concerned with increasing food production, raising the standard of living, and opening the way for help in family planning.

Make Sense, not War

The American Friends Service Committee affirms the glory of persons, the unique and absolute value of each human individual. As a Quaker organization, it believes that social problems and the conflicts that divide men and nations cannot ultimately be resolved by coercion, but only by policies that are founded on justice and motivated by love. It renounces war—all war—as a process that consumes the good it seeks and compounds the hatreds and evils that lead men to resort to it. For fifty-two years the Committee has been waging a campaign for world peace.

Since the end of the Second World War, when the United States emerged as a world power with unprecedented commitments around the globe, the need to educate the American public on the issues of world peace has been urgent. With the savage escalation of the war in Vietnam, it has become critical. But to shift the direction of public thinking away from its easy reliance on force is not a challenge to be met in a day—or a year. It is a task to be worked at, in season and out, and the AFSC works at it steadily, even though its resources are meagre and its vision is fallible. It produces and distributes literature on basic and topical issues of world peace, helps people concerned with peace to be more effective in their communities, and organizes family camps and summer institutes for discussion of world issues. It works with church groups, civic clubs, members of Congress, and the business and professional community to support efforts that reduce international frictions, and it cooperates with a wide range of activities in the peace movement, including nonviolent vigils and demonstrations. A special service arranges tours, operating through ten regional offices, for speakers well-known in the fields of peace and international affairs. Peace caravans, staffed by concerned young people, travel the country, speaking to churches and civic groups.

In supporting the Quaker peace testimony, the AFSC has always recognized that responsibility for peace rests with all nations and not with any one alone. It has therefore carried its work for peace into the international arena in reconciling actions and educational efforts. The Committee sponsors international conferences, where present and potential leaders of diverse countries discuss common problems related to world peace. AFSC offices in Europe, the Middle East, West Africa, South, Southeast, and East Asia, Washington, and at the United Nations in New York conducted 16 international conferences and seminars in 1968, involving 454 persons from 73 countries. In addition, during international crises, the Committee has undertaken special missions for the purpose of mediation and reconciliation.

The situation is plain. The world has never needed peace more—nor been riper for war—than now. The proposition is simple. Whatever may have been arguable in the past, modern war can no longer be an instrument of justice.

War must stop. It is time to make sense, not war. The brink of catastrophe is not man's natural habitat. You can help to avert human annihilation—and to enrich the quality of human survival—by contributing to the American Friends Service Committee.

Cathy Leroy/Black Star

Won't you make the Committee a vehicle through which your love and compassion are expressed? You can help relieve the suffering of civilians in Nigeria and Vietnam. You can help change the lives of citizens in our ghettos. You can help statesmen, citizens, and new generations of young people all over the world to be better instruments of peace-making . . . through the AFSC. The American Friends Service Committee is a corporate expression of Quaker faith and practice. It is rooted in the conviction that each human life is sacred, each man a child of God, and that love, expressed through creative action, can overcome hatred, prejudice and fear. To that end, the Committee undertakes programs of relief, service and education, ministering to both the physical and spiritual needs of men. Its work is made possible by the generous co-operation of thousands of concerned persons of all faiths.

Thank you! As a contributor you will receive the quarterly Quaker Service Bulletin giving news of the programs you are helping to support.

It is possible to do good in the twentieth century. In an age of complex problems, it is still possible for human effort to avert catastrophe and to redeem the quality of survival. Human feeling, thought, and imagination can still relieve human suffering, still save and rebuild human lives. To do justice and to love mercy have always been possible. Today, as fanaticism deepens and inequalities widen—as the means of genocide keep pace with the motives for it—justice and mercy have become critical human imperatives.

For fifty-two years, the American Friends Service Committee has been seeking and finding ways to do good in the twentieth century. A few of the present efforts are described in this circular. They are examples of the ways in which we will continue to try to do good in a warring world, with the help of individuals whose minds and hearts are concerned with the well-being of their fellowmen.

Atlanta, Georgia 30303

Dear Emory Via:

We are very pleased that you are willing to break into still another week end and be with us, at least for Friday evening, and possibly for some of our other sessions.

I enclose an agenda for the meetings. This is essentially what I reviewed with you over the phone this morning. Also attached is a not-too-up-to-date description of our current work and the latest issue of an internal publication - a dittoed newsletter by which we are trying to keep our far flung staff up-to-date on some of the issues and developments in the Community Relations Program and field.

As a result of our phone conversation, I felt very sure that we had hit upon a good idea in asking you to lead off our meeting. I'll be glad to see you again after a very long time.

Please keep track of expenses so that we can reimburse you for them, and let us hear of any fee involved.

As you may assume by the lack of a follow-up call, we have been in touch with Courtney and Penn can put you and your family up for Friday and Saturday evenings.

Sincerely

COMMUNITY RELATIONS PROGRAM DEVELOPMENTS & ISSUES

Since the last PDI report so much began to happen we felt we should issue #2 as soon as possible. The situation in Delano altered the day PDI #1 was mailed; a minimum wage bill is coming before the House; & AFSC attended a poverty conference that took some unexpected twists. We also wanted to tell you about the Philadelphia Housing program and the report on the self-help housing conference. If you have any comments on or suggestions for PDI please send them along.

THE GRAPE STRIKE. Shortly after PDI #1 went out, a memorandum from Cesar Chavez, director of the National Farm Workers Association, clarified the situation in Delano, California.

Schenley has agreed to begin contract negotiations and has legally recognized that the NFWA represents the majority of Schenley workers in Kern and Tulare counties and will be their sole bargaining agent. Schenley has agreed to begin negotiations within 30 days (of April 7) resulting in the signing of a contract within 60 days.

The NFWA has halted boycott of Schenley products but is prepared to resume it should negotiations break down. The DiGiorgio corporation, largest grower in the area, has not agreed to negotiate and will not meet with the NFWA. It has agreed to hold an election to determine if its workers want NFWA. A boycott of DiGiorgio products appears to be in the offing.

Schenley and DiGiorgio were not the only growers being struck. The NFWA is still involved in a strike of some 30 other growers. The strikers still need moral and financial support.

AFSC's San Francisco office has appropriated $11,800 to meet the human needs of the strikers. $10,300 will have been spent by the end of April and an estimated $2,400 more will be needed through the end of May. This leaves the San Francisco office in need of $900 and receptive to contributions and suggestions for sources of funds.

In addition to financial support, CRD's Rural Affairs Committee has pointed out the continuing need for education and logislation concerning America's farm workers. This is particularly pertinent now in view of the pending legislation in the House of Representatives, which is discussed in the next item.

MINIMUM WAGE BILL. A new minimum wage bill is expected to come before the full House of Representatives around April 25. AFSC's program experience has indicated a need for nation-wide minimum wage, as well as for other social legislation such as the right to collective bargaining and unemployment benefits.

H.R. 13712 will extend coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act to 6.5 million additional workers, and will include farm workers. In testimony for AFSC before the Senate Subcommittee on Migratory Farm Labor, Scott Nielsen, CRD staff in southeastern Pennsylvania, indicated in July, 1965, that the inclusion of agricultural workers would equalize the position of farm workers with that of industrial workers. In addition, he pointed out that many growers and farmers feel, unless there is a federal minimum wage, they cannot raise wages because competition from states paying low wages would force them out of business.

In testifying before a special House subcommittee concerning the Economic Opportunity Act, Helen Baker, CRD Executive Committee and Board of Directors member, pointed out the need to extend existing social legislation, such as minimum wage, social security and unemployment insurance, to cover the rural poor and farm laborers if the war on poverty is to be comprehensive.

In general, H.R. 13712 (the Dent Bill) will set the minimum wage at $1.40 an hour starting February, 1967. This will be increased to $1.60 in February, 1968.

Among the newly covered workers are 485,000 farm laborers. The bill provides that farms using 500 man-days of labor in any calendar quarter of the previous year must pay the minimum wage. In determining which individuals shall comprise those counted for the 500 man-days requirement, a worker who meets all four of the following conditions will not be counted: (1) hand harvest workers who (2) commute daily from a permanent home (3) are employed in a traditional piece rate operation and (4) work less than 13 weeks per year in agriculture. However, when a farm has come under coverage of the bill, all workers on his farm will be covered.

Farm workers would get $1 minimum wage in 1967, $1.15 in 1968, and $1.30 in 1969. They will get no overtime provisions and, even the $1.30 wage works out to below the "poverty level".

Arguments against this bill state it will injure business, cut back job opportunities and raise food costs. In 1965 the Department of Labor issued a report which stated that "the economy adjusted easily to the increase in the minimum wage" under the 1961 amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act, and that "employment in these newly covered segments did in fact go up". Scott Nielsen and others have pointed out that field labor costs are a small part of the retail price of most farm products.

H.R. 13712 is limited in coverage. It is a weak bill. It does not touch on the right for farm laborers to bargain collectively, which was an issue in the Delano grape strike. Nor does it include piece rate workers. However, strategists fear that efforts to strengthen the bill will result in its demise. And, for all its failings, it is the first bill reported out of the committee to include farm laborers, and it is a start.

CCAP and AFSC. On April 13 and 14, the Citizens' Crusade Against Poverty held its second annual conference in Washington, D.C. It was at the luncheon session of the last day of the conference that R. Sargent Shriver, director of OEO, encountered some resistance to his efforts to outline the achievements of OEO. (To quote the papers he was hooted down and jostled.) AFSC was represented at that conference and we wish to share the experience with you. Interpretation in the mass media seems unfortunately to have telescoped events, meaning that the build-up of frustration did not come through, and to have fallen into the trap of assigning the disruption to a "group of troublemakers", thus obscuring what we think the important messages of the conference are.

In March of 1965 the CRD Executive Committee decided that AFSC should become associated with CCAP. This was done after ascertaining the purpose of the organization and what the responsibilities of membership entailed. Briefly, CCAP is a coalition of organizations and individuals dedicated to eradicating poverty from the nation. It is intended to be educational and catalytic, and also to act in promoting and implementing specific policies and programs on the national, local and community levels. Organizations belonging to CCAP participate in programs on a voluntary basis. Based on the assumption that CCAP was in the nature of a "watchdog" organization which did not commit members to a course of action, AFSC joined.

Barbara Moffett, Eleanor Eaton and Maria Pappalardo of the national staff, and Florence Kite, a national CRD Executive Committee member, attended the April conference. An estimated 1000 people attended, of which approximately 300 were "poor people", from Harlem, Watts, Selma, Mississippi Delta, Appalachia, Roxbury, Mass., Chicago, etc. These people participated in forum groups whose purpose was to make recommendations to the CCAP board concerning the forum topics. These topics were economic policy and poverty, quality education and the poor, maximum feasible participation of the poor, and new pioneering roles for private agencies in the war on poverty. (The forum gaining most attention was that on maximum feasible participation.)

In addition the Wednesday afternoon and Thursday morning sessions included addresses by groups representing certain areas of the country -- Delano, California, Mississippi Delta, Appalachia, Watts, Chicago, Central Harlem. These were stirring and effective statements of needs and the shortcomings of the present efforts to meet them.

Attached is a slightly subjective time schedule of what happened which may help communicate the temper of the conference. But in addition, those of us attending the conference would like to indicate some of the implications and some of the thoughts resulting from what happened.

First of all, the poor people who attended were angry from the moment they arrived. Some of this was beneath the surface, some quite evident. This was the anger born of frustration and desperation, of programs mismanaged, of promises broken, of misunderstanding.

Coupled with this was what we feel was a lack of organization of the conference itself. There was insufficient explanation of the purpose of the conference and of CCAP, which led to misunderstanding on the part of the poor, or possibly to an intentional misinterpretation by some. There was also no way to determine who was an official representative or delegate to the conference and who had just come of their own volition.

The mood of the poor and the unpreparedness of the conference leaders to cope with their honest anger contributed to the disintegration of the luncheon at which Shriver spoke into a temporary chaos of shouting and emotional outbursts.

We feel that any "troublemakers", whether they had come for that purpose or had spontaneously joined forces at the conference, could not have held sway unless they had spoken to the deep-felt mood of the crowd. The poor showed lack of confidence in OEO, and a mistrust of practically anyone who wasn't "poor". But for all that, it seemed that the majority of the poor had come ready to work for concrete goals. In this they were disappointed, which will only add another letdown for themselves and their constituents back home.

This conference has indicated to us two things -- first, the breakdown in communication, which must be based on trust, between the poor and those working to help them. No one from the CCAP board could command the respect of these people or bring the conference back to order once it had broken up.

More importantly, it appears that the OEO alone cannot "win the war on poverty". The message we felt came through loud and clear was that present governmental programs, including OEO, do not add up to a "war on poverty". The poor themselves pointed out that, in a "shooting war", the entire resources of the nation are brought into play. Such a marshalling of forces is what is needed to combat poverty. This means massive programs of relief, food distribution, creation of jobs, production of homes, and much more. And, judging from the attitude of the people, the time for discussing the problems of the poor is over. The poor felt their problems had been adequately defined. What they wanted, and what is needed is concrete action to stamp out poverty.

PHILADELPHIA METROPOLITAN HOUSING PROGRAM. This 18-month program has been operating from the national offices of AFSC since November, 1965. As a demonstration project it is attempting to develop with government agencies an affirmative policy especially in relating FHA/VA housing to minority buyers. This has involved developing close working relationships with federal agencies and new techniques in reaching buyers on a large scale through use of the mass media.

Some of the concrete aims of the project have included stirring leadership for buyer encouragement and education from within the minority community and stimulating fair housing councils to active involvement in buyer motivation.

Nate Greene directs and coordinates the program. Two field workers, Julia Robinson and Barbara Krasner, work with Nate. At present Julia is coordinating the Housing Information Service in Camden, New Jersey, and is working with Barbara on using the mass media to inform the entire metropolitan area about HIS.

Thus far the program has used posters, an advertisement in a local paper which is widely read in the minority community, spot announcements on radio stations, meetings with civic, religious, social, etc. groups. The program is deeply involved in buyer workshops and has recently established workshops in two new areas.

As another method of reaching a mass market, a fold-out brochure has been developed. Ten thousand copies have been run and staff are planning to distribute them at meetings, on a selective door-to-door basis, and through approximately 10 cooperating brokerage offices.

One new idea, which may or may not be attempted, is a Fair Housing Sunday. This could involve a white and Negro cleric swapping pulpits on a particular Sunday and speaking on fair housing to the congregation. Or, the sermon for a particular Sunday and the church bulletin cover for that day could be devoted to fair housing. Or, there could be a combination of these approaches.

All these methods of informing the minority community are of an experimental or research nature. Staff are attempting to determine, among other things, which method or methods reach the most people and obtain the desired response. The project will continue through April, 1967.

SELF-HELP HOUSING CONFERENCE. The report on the First National Conference on Self-Help Housing has been printed and is ready for distribution. A copy is attached. If you remember, the conference ended just before round-up last December and was much on the minds and in the conversation of those who had attended it.

Digests of the major addresses of the conference are included in the report along with the recommendations and work shop reports. Of particular interest is Section V, "Planning For The Future". This section reports on the establishment of a permanent self-help housing organization, International Self-Help Housing Associates (acronymically, ISHHA). The formation of ISHHA was in response to a conference recommendation which was later amplified by specific and detailed suggestions from conference participants.

An organizing committee met in February and officially created ISHHA and has begun incorporation proceedings.

ISHHA is intended to serve as a center for the collection, evaluation and dissemination of information and experiences in self-help housing. In addition it will develop and encourage new techniques in the field. To implement these and other goals, ISHHA proposes to undertake specific projects such as distributing information collected from all groups working in self-help housing through a newsletter, booklets and other materials; encourage on-the-job training programs; develop programs to bring self-help housing to the lowest income groups in our society; assist federal and state government agencies in making maximum use of their resources in support of community development and self-help housing, and coordinate the search for new materials and construction techniques.

ISHHA is being directed by Mariana Alcock, CRD Committee member and Conference Coordinator, who is serving as temporary Organizing Secretary. Further information can be obtained from her at 522 Kerfoot Farm Road, Wilmington, Delaware 19803.

CCAP 2ND ANNUAL MEETING

A DIGEST AND COMMENTARY ON MAJOR EVENTS AND FORUM C

Wednesday, April 13

9:30 - Address by Walter Reuther

He commented on the nature of CCAP, briefly calling it a broad-based coalition united by a moral commitment, a coalition of conscience. He went on to deplore the situation of poverty in the midst of plenty, especially the social or spiritual poverty resulting from economic poverty. Reuther called for participation of the poor in American life and for the refocusing of the value system away from market place morals.

10:30 - lunch Forum C - "Maximum Feasible Participation" began its stormy sessions.

The chairman, Bayard Rustin, following a general discussion and sharing of problems, summed up the consensus as follows: (1) OEO has failed in obtaining maximum feasible participation of the poor in CAPs; (2) the poor should be paid for their participation on CAP boards; (3) the poor need technical assistance for utilizing government programs. Point #3 was shouted down. The forum felt the poor needed to get the money available, not more technicians.

Lunch - Address by Dr. Eugene Carson Blake (emphasis on fighting communism)

3:15 - Voices from the Nation Panel

Delores Huerta, speaking for a delegation from Delano, California, effectively described the organization of the grape strike.

Mrs. Unita Blackwell, a member of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party representing the delegation from the Mississippi Delta gave the first stirring speech of the day. Among other things she said, "We want the resources and money in the hands of the people. The people are tired. There's a political conspiracy to get us out of Mississippi."

The final speech was delivered by Carl Johnson, representing the Appalachia delegation.

Wednesday, April 13 (con't)

4 or 4:30 - Continuation of Forums.

Before disintegrating into suggestions, counter-suggestions, general griping, real or imagined procedural slights, Forum C managed to formulate four proposals: (1) the poor should form their own CAP type organizations and hire their own technicians; (2) OEO should not back CAPs run by the power structure; (3) in some areas there must be free elections of the board of supervisors who run the locality; (4) the board of CCAP itself should be extended to include the poor.

8:15 - Post-Dinner address by Roy Wilkins

9:00 - 1:00 A.M. Continuation of Forums.

(By this time many people not originally in Forum C had gotten wind of the liveliness of the sessions and had drifted in. As other forums ended, more joined. Anyone who felt like voting, or speaking, was allowed to do so.)

By this time, Marge King, from Syracuse, New York, had drawn up and had mimeographed close to 10 resolutions concerning suggestions for CCAP board action, and suggestions on CCAP structure and membership. She had at a previous session been asked to do so by Rustin in his capacity as chairman. She had been outspoken at previous forum session. She was assisted by other like-minded, and likewise outspoken delegates. These resolutions were gone over point by point, with many additions, amendments, etc., and amidst much verbal, and not always helpful, participation by the poor and/or their representatives.

Thursday, April 14

9 or 9:30 - More Voices from the Nation.

Delegations from Central Harlem, Watts, and Chicago's west side addressed the conference. A teenager from Chicago gave a moving and at points bitter speech on the effects of poverty, the educational system, and on the interference in the war on poverty of the war in Viet Nam.

12:30 or so Lunch

1 or 1:30 - Address by Sargent Shriver.

Newspaper reports of what Shriver said, or attempted to say are fairly accurate. Therefore, let us move on to what happened.

As Shriver rose to speak, a group of people stood, two by two, in the back and to the side of the room. There may have been twenty, some of whom were holding a paper in their hands. It is possible that these people were holding copies of the resolutions passed by Forum C and intended to give or read them to Shriver directly. There is no way for us to be sure, and at this point it is sheer speculation. At any rate, as Shriver began detailing the achievements of OEO, shouts to the effect of "We've never seen any money" began from the standing group. This mood was picked up by some of the poor in the audience who began shouting questions and accusations. Shriver continued to read his speech, finished and hurried from the room, hotly pursued by a small group.

Note: As far as we knew, there was no question period scheduled following Shriver's address. Around 3 P.M., an OEO representative (Hyman Bookbinder), who had been in touch with Shriver indicated to the conference that Shriver had not been asked to answer questions.

A OCAP official asked that the room be cleared for ten minutes so the tables could be removed. Board members vacated the head table. For the next hour or so, the poor, or a sizeable portion of them, stayed in the room talking to reporters, each other, and anyone else who would listen. This was a vehement outpouring of anguish and frustration and anger. Other conference participants sat and listened, or drifted in and out of the room. Eventually, it is impossible to determine when, a woman from HARYOU-ACT apparently had taken over chairing the session, and had imposed a sort of order. Those wishing to speak their minds lined up at the microphone and spoke in turn. She put down disturbances from the floor.

In a while, bayard Rustin and some other Board members returned to the head table. Rustin quite politely attempted to resume chairmanship of the meeting as he had to leave for Philadelphia soon. By this time the woman from HARYOU had resumed consideration of the resolutions, which was the order of the session. Rustin had asked that he present the resolutions of Forum C before Forum B had been considered. He was refused, and he left. Dr. Blake took charge of the meeting, which then became bogged down in procedural arguments and quiet disorganization. At 4 P.M. he declared it impossible to transact business, and officially adjourned the conference. A conference participant quickly took the mike and asked that, as the tape recorders which had been used all thru the conference to record all discussions for later hearing by the Board were still operating, the conference vote unanimously to accept all recommendations so that the Board would take them into consideration, which was, we think, the intent of the conference. This was met with approval and affirmative action.

COMMUNITY RELATIONS DIVISION

BASIS. AFSC work in community relations is based on our belief in the worth of the individual and his right to grow up in a social environment in which he can freely develop his God-given potentiality. We recognize how deeply each one of us is conditioned by participation in an unjust society, but we affirm our faith that with God's help, we can help men transcend the particularities of race, color and status and truly implement in the social order their yearning for brotherhood.

PURPOSE. We attempt to change those aspects of our community life which (1) deny basic rights and equality of opportunity; (2) inhibit some members of society from responsible participation in decision-making processes; and (3) assign second class status to those who do not conform to dominant cultural patterns. We look toward a truly free and integrated society, by which we mean one where the individual has the widest option, one in which differences, individual or group, are welcomed, but one in which all of these freedoms are undergirded by a sound base of equal rights, opportunity and shared responsibility.

CURRENT PROGRAM: GOALS AND SCOPE.

The goal of the Indian Program is to encourage the development of competence and confidence in American Indian communities to meet their pressing social, economic and political problems and to build understanding between Indians and non-Indians which will permit a two-way sharing of values and ideas. Scope: Current projects include Intertribal Friendship House, Oakland, California; community development work on the San Carlos Apache Reservation, Arizona, the Northern Cheyenne Reservation in Montana and on reservations in Southern California and Western Washington.

The goal of the Rural Affairs Program is to encourage and help people to develop rural communities or areas in which they can find continuing economic, social and educational opportunity and growth. Key rural problems include the unstructured character of labor-management relations in agriculture, the low wages paid the seasonal farm laborer, the exclusion of farm workers from benefits of social legislation, a high incidence of poverty, shifting patterns of agricultural employment and lack of knowledge of available resources. Scope: A ten year community development program among seasonal farm laborers in Tulare County California has manpower training, self-help housing, and employment assistance as components; a community relations program in Southeastern Pennsylvania has a focus on migrants; in five counties of Southern New Jersey a project is seeking to help the rural residents find answers to their economic, social and health problems. A special six-months developmental program, carried out in relationship with the New Jersey OEO has been another part of AFSC work in South Jersey. An experimental, one-year, Migrant Leadership Development Program ~~is proposed~~ for the East Coast migrant stream.

Now at work.
See PD/#1.

The goal of our School Desegregation Program is an integrated school system in which education is of the highest quality and in which decisions regarding curriculum, pupil assignment, use of facilities, and selection and assignment of faculty and other staff will be on a non-racial basis. Scope: Starting with a project in Washington, D.C. in 1952, we have worked in a number of areas. Current efforts include work in selected communities in North and South Carolina, Louisiana, Mississippi, Georgia, Alabama and Virginia. See Task Force - PDI #1

The goal of our Employment on Merit Program is equal job opportunity (so that employers will recruit, hire and up-grade on merit, and training facilities and membership in unions will be available on a non-discriminatory basis). Scope: Starting in 1947, programs were carried on in a number of northern cities. Currently efforts are focussed on Atlanta; and Houston, Texas. (See Housing Programs below.)

The goal of our Housing Opportunities Program is an open housing market in which members of any group may freely purchase or rent in the neighborhood in which they want to live. Scope: Staffed programs are carried on in the metropolitan areas of Washington, D.C., Boston (see Urban Affairs Program below), Los Angeles, Chicago and New York and in smaller Ohio and Indiana communities. Special efforts are being undertaken in Atlanta and San Francisco, which will seek to join the issues of housing and jobs. as Margaret Via knows -

The goal of our urban affairs work is to develop leadership and stimulate maximum citizen participation in overcoming some of the multi-faceted problems of the city; its poverty, its racial divisions and its complexity and vastness, which challenge the functioning of democracy; the crisis in its educational systems, and its housing patterns and barriers, racial and economic. Scope: Experimental programs are being carried on in Chicago, Illinois, and San Francisco, California. The Boston Low Income Housing Program (see above) has an urban orientation. Work in the Pasadena area will soon reflect an urban concern also.

The goal of our Rights of Conscience Program is to accept the individual and help him with "sufferings" grants, financial assistance for legal costs and fees, or legal counsel where he has taken a conscience-based position, to so present the legal issue of conscience to the Court that a favorable precedent on a case-by-case basis might encourage others to follow conscience and be protected when they do. Scope: No local projects. "Cases" in any part of the country. Recent emphasis on sufferings grants in southern civil rights situations.

PROGRAM DEVELOPMENT. The AFSC began a formal Race Relations Program in 1944. Several years later it became the Community Relations Program, the change in title reflecting the broader concerns of the group for a range of problems hindering the development of sound communities.

The process of program development is neither exclusively one of response to local interest nor solely a result of a national overview of the problem area. Our process seeks to combine the local and national perspectives and allow for initiatives from either direction but calls for a mutual process of working out final plans among the AFSC offices involved.

The present program is composed of national work and local projects across the country. Most field projects are guided by a local advisory committee. They are tied in directly to the AFSC regional office structure, receiving their direct supervision from regional staff and their consideration as a regional effort from the Regional Office Executive Committee.

The national office relationship to these efforts includes: (1) service, counsel and review with the goal of the qualitative development of AFSC work in this field, (2) interpretation of our experience and the issues in the field within the AFSC, with various of its constituencies, and in the wider community, (3) relating our experience to other agencies and to government, (4) setting broad AFSC policy in the field, (5) working with the Finance Department to interpret our work to sources of financial support and (6) working with the Personnel Department to apply experience gained within the program to the recruitment and selection of staff.

The National Community Relations Division organizes its Committee structure in relation to this work as follows: (1) a Division Executive Committee (Board appointed) is charged with overseeing the work of the Division as a whole (considers major issues in the field and possible AFSC responses, new program and issues and problems cutting across present program lines, assures adequate review and evaluation) and (2) national program committees (appointed by Division Executive Committee) to give ongoing guidance to the Division's work as currently organized (guide work of national program staff, counsel to field efforts, responsible for qualitative development of program in given field).

The decision-making process, looked at in the larger framework of the AFSC is represented by the following chart:

CRITERIA. Program concerns arise regionally and nationally often with a sense of urgency in either or both places. The question of deciding on the appropriateness of a given proposal for community relations attention and of deciding what priority we should give to it is difficult. Our Statement of Purpose suggests that perhaps we could be asked to deal with those problems which involve the relationship of one group to another in which real or assumed differences (racial, color, ethnic, religious, status) are the basis for denying equal opportunity or assigning second class status.

Therefore we must pay particular attention to factors which enter into decisions to take up a new effort. In April 1963, the Community Relations Division Executive Committee developed the following criteria. Not all of these criteria apply in each instance; in every case rigid interpretations and stiffling boundaries would be avoided.

1. Does the work offer opportunity to contribute to the prevention or to the solution of a problem and not deal solely with its symptoms?

2. Is there need for our particular contribution, in light of what other groups may or should be doing?

3. Does the work have demonstration value? Are its lessons transferrable?

4. Would it enhance our current work, bring new insights or quality to our present efforts?

5. Does it meet a particularly critical need or have symbolic value?

6. Does it offer an opportunity to respond to the heightened awareness or sensitivity which crises sometimes leave in their wake?

7. Do we have the necessary resources?:

   a. Sufficient committee and staff concern -- regional and national -- to ensure proper attention to the work within the total AFSC structure

   b. Experience which fits the AFSC to undertake the work or valid reasons why we should develop competence in the area proposed

   c. Access to adequate personnel to do the job.
